Too Evenly Balanced for Comfort

The Supreme Court of the United States is too evenly balanced to be comfortable, either to the poor man or to the rich man: that is, the man who wants even chances in government for all legitimate interests on the one side; and the man who wants business to reign in government, with power to fix its own profits without due consideration for the man who performs its labor, on the other side.

We find five justices standing with and for the people: Chief Justice Hughes and Associate Justices Brandeis, Stone, Roberts, and Cordozo. The other 4 justices seem to stand for organized wealth and for everything that it wants to fill its coffers, regardless of who else may starve. Their rulings are in favor of the same fellow who wants to say what a dollar shall be worth, as well as to say how thick a slice of meat a laborer may have. This group calls themselves "Conservatives," and in a way they seem to be anxious to conserve the rights of wealth and permit the rich to name the price of the things other folks buy and sell, as well as name the figures for what they themselves buy and sell. This group is composed of Van Devanter, McKeynolds, Sutherland, and Butler. They seldom fail to stand with organized wealth, while the other five put a more reasonable construction on national questions, giving life as much consideration as they do property.

Democracy vs. Mammon

The greatest fight in all of our government's history is now in progress. The participants are democracy and mammon.

Democracy says the great mass of our citizens are either hungry, ragged, losing their homes or have already lost them.

Mammon says it has not satisfied its gluttony and to give it more. It demands the right to direct all business, fix all the prices, measure and direct all the values of money, draw all the interest, and direct the president the cabinet, the congress, and all other branches of the government's business because the common people should not have anything to do or say about the power of money, even though they do the work that creates the wealth of the world.

There has been no day since the organization of government when the public so much needed to stand up for and demand democratic government as at the present time. If we let the general principles of the New Deal be destroyed by the money power, it will take at least another generation to get us back to our present level.

It is important that we excuse any apparent errors in the processes of the New Deal and give those in charge time to prove their merits; after which we will find the wisdom that they contain.

Do not follow the false propaganda teachers, who represent the people who have grown gorgeously rich at the expense of the poor.

Mixed Metaphors—But You Get the Idea

Well, the news filtering back from the farmers' big tobacco meeting at Raleigh indicates that Senator Josiah failed to land safely when he made his grand debut in his flirting with the farmers.

The farmers seemed to smell him, even before he got the halter up to their noses.

You see, they have learned to watch him, for they evidently think he is fishing with the point of his hook hidden.

A Righteous Judgment

It was a righteous judgment of the county court recently in finding Professor James Uzle, of Jamesville, not guilty on a charge of assault growing out of the whipping of a school child.

In this particular instance he had whipped a boy who had assaulted another boy with a knife.

The parents should have thanked the professor, the school, and the state for having enough interest in their boy to try to correct him before he reaches a prison gate or even an electric chair.

One of the great faults of the day is our failure to properly bring up our children in the way they should go, a neglect which causes much sorrow and grief later.

In our system of society we have parents to care for and train children. They often fail. Our next bulwark for good citizenship is the school, where a broadened line of instruction and management is offered, and this often does not succeed as it should. Leaving the school, we next go out into the wide world, where we think we can do as we please. Thinking matters over, and reflecting on the fact that our parents and the school failed to shape us in the way we should go, we launch out with a determination to do as we please, even if it means to knock down, drag out, kick and stamp, even to rob and kill. So we soon find the firm hand of the government tightening down on us and we are landed behind prison bars, still kicking against the state, the school, and the home.

We commend the school that properly punishes crime in its jurisdiction. These modern mollicoddles who claim to have found that the child should never be punished have never proved their point, and perhaps are responsible for a large part of the downfall that many young folks of the day are undergoing. It is the young folks who are going to jail—the same ones who have run over father, mother, the school, and who are trying to run over the state.

Teachers, correct them while they are in a pliable state, even if it requires the lash.

Human Rights vs. the Constitution

Too much is being said about the "sacredness" of the Constitution. We, of course, need to respect the Constitution when it is right and just in its relations with the people, but we submit that it was never intended by our forefathers, who fought for liberty and the establishment of our Constitution, that it would ever be used to prostitute the rights of man.

It was never intended to give one kind of business the right to destroy another kind of business. The courts are right in declaring the people should have preferment over the Constitution.

If there is any one thing that the Constitution stands for, it is to protect man in his honest endeavors to perform the duties of an honest citizen, regardless of whether he is rich or poor.

And when the Constitution upholds and exalts property rights above human rights, then it is high time to modify and change the Constitution.

The Surest Way

Much has been written about how to prevent highway accidents, and now somebody has written thirteen (unlucky number) rules which will, if carried out, bring them about. The prescription suggested follows:

"Very few people really crave to have an automobile accident, probably no one, unless he wants to commit suicide. Well, here's a prescription, not sugar-coated, but the smart driver will detect at once its value:

1. Always pass a car when nearing the top of a hill or rounding a curve when you cannot see ahead.
2. Never watch the other car and never make allowance for the other fellow's poor or careless driving. He is always sober and will look out for you.
3. Drive carelessly in traffic, cutting in and out at will. The roads and streets all belong to you.
4. Never signal with your arm before making a turn. Others drivers will always slow up without knowing your intentions.
5. Never look either way before pulling away from the side of the curb. The traveling public always knows what you are going to do anyway.
6. Never come to a stop at blind crossings. You always happen along when nobody else is near.
7. Never use your horn. It might run down your battery.
8. Never have your brakes tested and let your stop light go out. If you need to stop quickly, you can run against a telephone pole and the car behind you will have to stop without seeing your light.
9. Throw out your clutch and slap on the brakes quickly while turning a wet curve. It'll probably turn your car around in the road and give you a nice thrill or some in contact with another car and you'll enjoy the bump.
10. Always pass another car on a railroad crossing—you may get there by the time the train does.
11. Always increase your speed just before getting to a railroad crossing, or you may not hit the train.
12. Never observe traffic signals and stop signs. They are only for your entertainment.
13. Do not keep your car in good mechanical condition. It costs more than your life is worth.

A Lot of Nothing

Frank Smethurst, in News and Observer.

Now see what the government's spending program has done.

The Intertype Corporation, an organization which deals in typesetting machinery and supplies, reported the other day that the extraordinary demand for ciphers in the printing trades had completely exhausted the supply normally maintained to meet current needs, and it has been necessary to transfer emergency orders to the factory.

At least somebody is buying something, even if it is a lot of nothing.
