PLAN REROUTING OF SCHOOL BUS ROUTES IN STATE

Walking Distance To Bus and School Reduced By Half Mile

The 1935 general assembly increased the cost of transporting children to and from school by about $250,000 a year when it shortened the walking distance to bus lines to only one mile and to school to a mile and a half. Formerly children were required to walk to bus lines if they lived within a mile and half, and had to walk to school if they lived within two miles of the school. But this change of only a half a mile in the walking distance to bus lines and to schools would mean an increase in the cost of transportation of at least $250,000 a year on last year's basis of operations. But the 1935 general assembly also changed the law with regard to the routing of school busses, giving the School Commission authority to fix bus routes and taking this authority out of the hands of the local school officials. As a result, Claude F. Gaddy, head of the transportation division of the State School Commission, is hoping that bus routes can be changed, shortened and trimmed so that the cost of operation can be reduced enough to absorb the additional cost involved by the change in the walking distance to bus lines and schools. Already the School Commission has 15 men at work in as many counties, checking over the old school bus routes and making changes. Under the new law, county lines will be ignored and children will be transported to the nearest schools, regardless of what county these children or schools may be in. Under the old law, the local school authorities were supposed to make many of these changes, but the pressure of local politics and from school patrons were said to have proved so strong that in most of the counties the rerouting of school busses was virtually ignored. But now that the School Commission is going to do the job, with the local school authorities having little to say about it, indications are that the bus routes are actually going to be changed both to reduce mileage and gasoline consumption as well as to secure greater efficiency for the schools, so say reports coming from Raleigh. Just how the re-routing of the bus routes will affect the attendance upon Martin Schools is not known, but it is possible that a few on the borders will be diverted to schools in other counties. The bus routings have been kept up to date in this county, and little improvement can be made over the present system, it is believed.

Warren Presides Over the House
 Favorable Comment Made Over His Ability To Handle Chair Duties

Recognition of the legislative abilities and accomplishments of Representative Lindsay C. Warren, again came a few days ago when he was selected for the most difficult task of presiding over the House in the committee of the whole during the time when bitter controversy ran high on the public utilities holding company "death sentence" bill. He occupied the chair seven days. He has previously shown conspicuous ability in that position. Commenting upon the selection of Mr. Warren for guiding the affairs of the committee as a whole during the turbulent days that this body wrestled with the public utilities measure, Will P. Kennedy, correspondent for the Washington D. C. Star, says, in part, under the column "Capitol Side-lights": "It is the consensus of opinion of his colleagues that he was fearless, firm, fair—and preserved order excellently—in most difficult situations. His rulings were of the highest parliamentary order. He was always courteous, smiling, unruffled—he had the poise and self-confidence and he had the entire confidence of his fellow members. Seldom had a presiding officer been applauded as was Representative Warren. It is predicted that some day he will occupy the chair in his own right as Speaker of the House of Representatives."
