Problems Not Yet Solved

The multitudinous problems facing the American people were not solved in the reelection of President Roosevelt a few days ago. Surely, it is agreed, his reelection will make the tasks before each and every one easier to solve and handle. But the task of supplying energy for the march ever onward is ours to ignore or support. Success or failure will be measured through our efforts, and not through those of the president.

Assuming the leadership of a depressed people four years ago, Mr. Roosevelt has led us far, and he did it despite strong opposition from some sections and with little aid from anyone. During the next four years, it is certain that every individual will have a part in carrying on and keeping in step with the march of progress.

Turning to the farmer's problem, it is almost certain that future aid will come through his own efforts. If he remains idle, he can expect little to be handed to him in the way of benefits or gifts. Surely, there is a leadership within the farming group that can take up where the President was forced to quit. Surely, the farmers themselves will rally around this leadership, and make for a more certain future for agriculture. Already the Farm Bureau, one of the leading organizations of its kind in the world, is forging ahead in the interest of agriculture. Will the farmers rally to its support, or will they stand idly by and gamble on what the marketing season will hold for them a year hence?

The laborer finding refuge from honest work when there is honest work will, no doubt, find it to his advantage to break away from the sheltering wings of the government. If the move requires more energy, and enter private employment whenever and wherever the opportunity presents itself.

The average man who has not received direct benefits from the New Deal, but who has been aided because others were aided, will have to continue to work and work hard. In so much as he pushes forward, he will profit to just that extent.

Big business is not going to return to the old policy of "the public be damned." So long as big business plays the game fair and square, then just that long will it prosper. The rules of the game may not seem fair at times, but in the long run business and the public will profit.

The entire country was all "het up" during the recent campaign, and it may be well to continue "het up" in meeting and handling the problems that are to be expected day by day in the future.

Legality of Election Doubtful

That North Carolina held an illegal election recently is almost certain, and that there will be nothing ever heard about it is almost equally as certain. In short, the United States Constitution, the old document that is so dear to Republicanism and so sacredly guarded by several of the "nine old men," says the people shall vote for electors, who, in turn, shall elect a president and vice president. As it stands now, no electors have been elected in reality, and just how the electoral college will get its eligible pupils early next January is a bit puzzling.

But the legality of the election, so far as it had to do with voting for presidential and vice presidential nominees, is of little consequence. The main idea surrounding the new way of voting directly for president and vice president points to a constitution that is a bit out of date, to say the least. Not more than one or two of the several hundred thousand North Carolinians taking part in the recent election will deny that the direct method followed this year for the first time in voting directly for president and vice president is far more simple than the old way, but is the system legal? And would the "nine old men" say it was legal if the question was ever placed before them?

The farmers of the constitution apparently intended that the election of a president be as far removed from the people as possible, but, despite the old document, the election job rests more firmly in the hands of the people than ever before. The system has changed, but can it be said that the system is not contrary to the constitution?

Hold a Steady Course

Now is a good time for men to hold steady heads, while the United States is rejoicing at the success of democracy and enjoying a period of general prosperity.

We need to remember that we make the most mistakes when things run along too easily. We forget that it is in our unguarded moments that we let opportunities pass which we are unable to call back.

And, while things may look good on this side of the Atlantic, conditions in the Far East are by no means in good shape, and the war clouds are hanging rather heavily over much of Europe and Asia. The cause that has only recently won a great victory in America is suffering greatly in the East, and democracy is trembling—to say the least—in Italy and Germany, as well as in Spain, with Fascism devouring democracy and proposing to rule with an iron hand.

While we may propose to keep out of entanglements with foreign nations, we must admit that our relations are such that we can scarcely hope to avoid complications in the event of a general European conflagration. So we Americans will have to apply the spirit of brotherly love and not demand the best of every international trade we engage in. We have too long sought a large export trade upon a principle of selling our trust-made goods too high in foreign lands while dumping our general farm supplies at starvation prices.

We need to follow a course of conservatism as well as conservation, and take care of our resources, both as individuals and as a nation—and, most of all, we should hold our heads through seasons of prosperity.
