

Farmers Are Urged To Save Their Food

"North Carolina is preparing to do its part in the "Food for Freedom" campaign," says D. S. Weaver, extension agricultural engineer of N. C. State College. "but," he adds, "proper food conservation and storage is just as important as food production."

The extension man says there is no better way in which the average farmer can assist in the great "Food for Defense" program than to be sure that every bit of useful food and feed on his farm is saved for eventual consumption.

As an example, Weaver pointed out that sweet potatoes is one of the most widely-grown crops in the State, and yet a loss of 50 per cent in storage often results due to inferior equipment and methods. "Sweet potato curing and storage requires considerable knowledge and attention to details," the engineer pointed out.

To help improve the equipment and methods of potato storage in North Carolina, the Agricultural Engineering Department at State College has obtained a quantity of

Soldier Has Unique Way Of Finding His Direction

Capt. Walter E. Kraus, executive officer of the 45th Field Artillery Battalion was accosted on the final phase of a problem one night recently, by a man who ran up and breathlessly inquired, "Where is the Command Post?" Capt. Kraus, thinking the man was bringing information of great importance, answered, "Over there. Why?"

The man replied, "Well, sir, my bed is just on the other side."

Copies of a new publication issued by the United States Department of Agriculture, it is titled: "Storage of Sweet Potatoes," and is Bulletin No. 1442. A copy may be obtained free by writing the Extension Agricultural Engineer, State College Station, Raleigh.

Weaver suggested that the possibility of converting old store buildings and similar structures into sweet potato storage houses be investigated in smaller towns and villages. The essentials of such a storage place are: Dryness, adequate ventilation, air tight walls, and provision for heating the building.

Quality First In Sale Of Extra Vegetables

Quality is the first essential in the sale of surplus vegetables, says H. R. Niswonger, extension horticulturist of N. C. State College. "The purchaser has no more taste for inferior vegetables than the gardener, himself," Niswonger declared, "and the buying public will protest inferiority by limiting or refraining from purchasing them."

After high quality, the horticulturist said, the second consideration in marketing surplus vegetables is attractive appearance. If an article appeals to the eye, the sale is half made. This idea involves the grading of produce, with reference to size, color, shape, ripeness, soundness, and method of display, packing and packaging.

Third comes honesty in packing or bunching. Too frequently, Niswonger stated, the imperfect, specked, unclean specimens have a habit of hiding themselves within the package or bunch of good products. The evil of this practice is readily apparent, he declared.

As a fourth consideration, the

WILLIAMSTON, N. C.

State College specialist said the package or bunch should be of convenient and desirable size. He suggested that asparagus be marketed in bunches of 2 to 3 pounds in weight, beets in bunches of 4 to 6 with tops unclipped, carrots in bunches of from 5 to 10, depending upon size, or 3 large ones, weight 1 to 1 1-2 pounds; lettuce in bunches of 3 to 10, depending upon size; and turnips in bunches of 3 to 5, weight 1 1-4 pounds.

"Remember," Niswonger concluded, "the aim of the gardener should be to fully satisfy the consumer. Observance of this principle secures good prices, quicker sale, and increased demand."
