Senator Hill's Challenge

Commenting on an address by Senator Lister Hill to a joint session of the Alabama Legislature recently, the Alabama Journal, Montgomery, had the following to say:

"... The Senator has convictions and he stands by them. Of course, it takes no courage to say the fine things about our fighting boys that Mr. Hill said, nor does it take political courage to give praise to the industrial workers at home who have done such a fine job of providing for the men at the front. But with all the sniping, the criticism, the jealousy, the attacks upon the Democratic administration both from within and from without, it takes real courage to stand up and tell the world that this is the greatest and most constructive administration in the Nation's history; that it has done more for the South than any other; that its policies have resulted in phenomenal economic prosperity in Alabama. Not only that, but Mr. Hill defies the critics and challenges them to say what part of the New Deal they would abolish, what part they would put on the scrap heap. Not even the Republican critics, let alone so-called Democratic critics, have advocated the repeal of a single one of the major New Deal measures.

"As we give our all to the winning of the war," declared Senator Hill, "we may look back with pride upon the New Deal and its mighty achievements. Its reforms are now anchored in the very bedrock of our institutions. The New Deal not only saved the Nation in the beginning, and made it possible for the Nation to save itself today, but it opened the doors that common men throughout the land might enter into their inheritance."

No Complaining

Speaking in this county recently, Rev. George M. Kelly, for more than 30 years a missionary in China, recalled the stamina and hopefulness of the Chinese millions. Despite hardships piercing beyond the imagination, the Chinese do not complain. How marked must be the conditions in that great country compared with those in our land, and how marked is the attitude there compared with the one here.

Working at a rice dispensary, the missionary told how little Chinese children were carried to the station in such weakened condition they were unable to lift their hands and brush the flies that swarmed in their mouths and faces. He told how mothers would leave some of their children dead at home and drag the starving living to the dispensary for two morsels of rice. But they did not complain against their government.

Some of the men who were in the hospital on the cold floor as many as three days without attention. Others were three weeks traveling by stretcher to the hospital to have their wounds treated. Many died, but those who lived through the ordeal never complained.

Appreciative of those who would help China, the Chinese people are a bit skeptical about some of the American policies. Surely, they do not have a right to be skeptical when despite the poor communications systems and the illiteracy of the masses, the masses learned about the success of the scrap iron to Japan right up to Pearl Harbor, almost. Concessions, grabbed by us and other nations, shelled of commercialism. But despite suffering and dastardly treatment, the Chinese continue to fight the common enemy, and do not complain.

At a marked contrast with the attitude in this land where we grumble about rationing and even stoop to cheat and lie.

Tearing Down The Ban

"If men can ride to poker parties, why can't we ride to our bridge games?" some of the good women are asking. "If the men can ride to their club meetings and lodge pow-wows, why can't we ride to our meetings?" other good women are asking. "If some can take advantage of a shirt-tail business and ride to and fro and squeeze in after a questionable fashion a lot of pleasure driving?" why can't we ride to see our folks?, still others are asking. Others are wondering why this fellow and that guy can ride when and where he pleases and they can't do the same thing. Still others are puzzled to understand how some can travel under false pretense, make frequent trips when one would suffice.

Within itself the questionable traffic is not so terribly bad when limited to those thoughtless souls, but they are helping to tear down the pleasure driving ban, and once torn down completely, the boys on the firing lines will be able to tell the difference. And it is quite possible, too, that essential driving later on will be reduced in about the same degree that pleasure driving exists today.

Regardless of what the other fellow does, there is only one thing for the citizen who would live right and act right in the eyes of those lads on the battlefronts to do and that is abide by the regulations and keep his conscience clear. There'll be a day when those who abide by the rules fairly and squarely will be able to look returning soldiers, marines, sailors, coast guardsmen and others in the face and know that they did their bit, however little it may have been, on the home front and did it willingly. There's some consolation in helping to maintain the pleasure ban, after all, regardless of the way others act.

Why They Lead

News and Observer.

Mrs. Eddie Rickenbacker, who is active in war work, told a gathering of women: "Only a bomb in their front yard would wake up some women to their opportunity and responsibility." She has suffered from more dread and anxiety than any bomb could cause, and she has a right to be heard and followed. She is authority for the statement that people in Hawaii and Alaska purchase more bonds per capita than those in any other part of our country. They know what war is, for they have seen it on their front steps.

Despite suppression, the religious voices in Europe are still being raised. Recently a Danish clergyman told his flock—
