lasting peace, let 100 G. I.'s from the front lines, 100 Russian soldiers, 100 British fighters, and equal numbers from the Navy and other branches of the service come home and it is fairly certain they'd talk peace. It is admitted, however, that they would not think much about an economic trade whereby Mr. Clayton could sell his cotton, but after suffering in actual combat they could be expected to place peace ahead of everything else.

War Looms On Economic Front

Hardly before victory is proclaimed and peace is restored in Europe, war looms on the home economic front with the possibility that the peace will be thwarted. One of the greatest fights in over half century is having its beginning in Washington when ten Republican committee members voted solidly against renewing the Hull reciprocal trade agreements.

There is no doubt but what the trade agreements have proved very successful. They have helped strengthen trade relations and they have advanced the good neighbor policy. So much good was accomplished by them that President Roosevelt a short time before his untimely passing had asked that they be continued and with the power to halve the tariff rates in effect last January 1. Immediately the National Association of Manufacturers broadly hinted that there was a move for the "complete elimination of protective tariffs."

With some very few exceptions, the people of this nation have learned that we cannot be isolated in war. Neither can we be isolated in peace, and it is just as foolish to think we can build and maintain prosperity behind trade barriers as it is to think we are safe from attack behind ocean distances.

Some American businessmen are talking about export trade in the amount of billions of dollars. They are listed as favoring high tariffs, but nowhere is it pointed out how we can maintain a large export trade while hiding behind high tariff barriers.

We are freely giving of our young manhood and material wealth to win the war and restore peace; we must do something about our economy that will insure the peace.

Words of Wisdom

I am not at all concerned about the Lord being on our side, for we know that the Lord is always on the side of the right. But it is my constant anxiety and sincere prayer that I and this nation should be on the Lord's side.—Abraham Lincoln.

The interests of childhood and youth are the interests of mankind.—Janes.

It is to be regretted that the graded school had to be closed at the end of the seventh month. The condition of the treasury would not justify the eight months, therefore rather than have to make the next term one of six months out of debt by saving now, it was thought best to close. It is to be hoped that the present corps of teachers will be with us next year when they may continue the work that is so necessary and they perform so successfully.
