Girl Goes With Kimonos, Marine Finds In Japan

Marine correspondents, after chatting with a Leatherneck who tried to buy a kimono, are drawing the conclusion that Japan has its tie-in sales too, but different from the wartime American deal where you sometimes had to buy hair tonic to get cigarettes. The sales lady was a Japanese girl who had a limited supply of English but a large one of kimonos. As for selling a kimono though, the girl got across the idea that she'd have to ask her mother. The mother told the Marine he could have the kimonos—provided he took the girl with them.
