do to create this better world?"

They can do much. They can insure education for their children, teach them wisely, guard them against unnecessary insecurity. They can in this community of forests and farmland, the future of tomorrow's grown-ups is tied to the soil. And this destiny can be good or bad according to the way the present generation guards its forest resources and preserves the earth's fertility.

Farseeing people today will till every last ounce of product from the soil—but they will till wisely, keeping an eye on tomorrow. These same people will eat all of the top quality pulpwood the pulp and paper mills in this area so urgently need today—but they too will harvest wisely, replacing each tree cut with a seedling for tomorrow.

Two Tombs

Quietly, it called for only a single, short paragraph to be lost in the columns of the newspapers—the House of Representatives has passed a bill to provide for the burial beside the Unknown Soldier of an unknown serviceman of World War II.

Two tombs. They will stand in marble silence there on the hill in Arlington that overlooks a Washington become world capital, the hill that broods on the sweep of monument and building, of green lawns and the gray "temporaries" that the urgency of war called up to scar the green. And before them, in constant vigil, a sentry will step off his restricted round in token that * * * in token (it comes uneasily to the memory) that a grateful Nation has not forgotten those who lie unnamed on a thousand scattered battlefields.

Two tombs. They will shelter men who died—for what? Why, to defend a home, to release the poor and the downtrodden from oppression, to bulwark the ideals and the idealism that are America's glory — to make an end to war. Or has a Nation busy with normalcy, with profits, with self-seeking and with fear already forgotten even that?

Two tombs. Two quiet, simple tombs. Mark them well! There is not room in all this land, broad and mighty though it be, for a third.—St. Louis Star-Times.

No Other Alternative

An industrialist comes out with the startling news that a certain radio commentator is against big business, and yet big business feeds him.

Doesn't it go to prove that big business has come so near gobbling up the earth that one has no other alternative than to work for those who have?

TESTS PLEASE SENATOR

Sen. John H. Bankhead of Alabama expresses pleasure as he examines a cotton cord passenger car tire left in excellent condition for recapping after 68,000 miles of high speed driving in government tests. A new cotton tire cord has been developed which is 132 times stronger than the 68,000-mile cotton.

Why can't some inventive genius create a shirt collar that will not grow a saw-edge after several launderings?
