Tar Business Looking Up

With all the smearing going on in Washington, the tar business is looking up. There has been some talk about revitalizing the industry in North Carolina.

Byrd-Democrats and Taft-Republicans have been busy with the smearing task, using the tiny "five-percenters" as a mop to smear the administration. They apparently figure much liberal legislation can be snuffed out by a covering of tar.

Now, much tar has been needed in the smear campaign, but that need is small compared with what is needed to tar and feather those who really need tarring in a big way.

A little tar is needed for the investigating committee that strained to make mountains out of molehills and overlooked, intentionally or unintentionally, evidence that would have helped clear up the muddle.

Then an unlimited quantity of tar and leathers is needed for such men as Senator Joe McCarthy, the Wisconsin man who, it is alleged, acted to defraud his government out of income taxes after cleaning up $40,000 on the stock market.

Yes, if all those who need it are tarred and feathered in and around Washington, the tar, pitch and turpentine industry is certain to make a come-back in North Carolina right away.

Go To The Roots

Great Britain's economy is tottering on its foundation and, in keeping with our modern-day trend, the economists are trying to save the structure by patching the roof and painting the outside.

Britain needs and possibly is entitled to consideration, even beyond the billions already advanced. But some cold facts must be recognized, and once they are recognized a new course must be chartered if Britain hopes to live.

For years and years, Britain to its own aggrandizement, milked her Asiatic colonies, took toll of trade going and coming in all parts of the world, manipulated to its own advantage the currencies of other nations and ruled the roost with an iron fist. Its natural resources were adequate until recently. To hold its favored position, Britain had to fight one war after another, until now it has fought itself out, lost the egg-laying goose and exhausted many of its resources.

It was not the labor government that wrecked Britain. No government of any kind could have been expected to deliver under such conditions. And as long as these conditions exist, and it looks as if they are permanent, Britain will have to go to the very roots and start a new foundation if it would survive.

The little island is overpopulated and not self-sustaining. Instead of maintaining a surplus population, old Santa should offer transportation to the colonies where honest work will bring a dollar, and make unnecessary so much dollar-sending.

Quality First

It is an admirable trait in any one, a group, organization, town or city to grow big. But in recent years most of our attention has been centered on "bigness" and not enough on quality.

Too many of us measure the value of a town, one's fortune, a school, library or most anything by the population count, the number of dollars under command, how many pupils are in school, the number of books in a library. Too often we overlook the type of citizens a town has. Do the Al Capones, the hoodlums, the ones who take more than they give to a community predominate the population count. We'd rather see a little community of 100 good people than to see a big city crowded with bad people. We'd rather see a poor man with a rich heart than to see a rich man with only greed in his heart. We'd rather see a few good books in a library than to see the shelves bulging with cheap books and comic books and filthy volumes. We'd rather see a school with just a few sincere pupils than to see a building crowded with young folks who, some how or other, harbor the false idea that the world owes them a living, that the very best is not good enough for them.

And we see tobacco towns going to court to try and maintain what have been dubbed "Rump sales." Yes, it is fine to try and grow big, but let quantity be accompanied by quality.
