What Kind of Balanced Budget

(Commence of the Commence of

It is unanimously agreed that all want the national budget balanced. But, strange as it may seem, those crying the loudest for a balanced budget are working hardest against it. They call for a balanced budget in one breath and yell for lower taxes in the next.

No doubt the task will hurt, but the budget can be balanced, and balanced without saddling the little folks with a heavier burden. Possibly some economy can be practiced, but one main way to balance the thing is to get the money where the money is.

It is really sickening to read about halfbillion profits piled up by one concern and hear spokesmen of the same concern call for a balanced budget and lower taxes.

Now, it is possible to balance the budget by saddling the masses with a national sales tax. It is possible to balance the budget on paper, at least, by eliminating the farm programs, security programs and other programs. But whatever worry an unbalanced budget may cause, that worry will be negligible compared with the worry resulting from the elimination of farm, security and other programs. Balance the budget by going after the money where the money is.

A Bit Inconsistent

Quite a few letters reach our desk from time to time from some corporation. The spokesmen for some of those corporations proclaim in a loud voice free enterprise, and condemn government in business. While those spokesmen express opposition to government in business, some of their own corporations turn around and buy printed envelopes from the government.

It must be admitted that, in some instances, it is cheaper to buy envelopes from the government, and frankly a good business man will shop for the best bargain. Possibly the government could do some of the things those corporations are doing and do it more cheaply, but it would be socialism for the government to "mess" in that corporation's business even if to "meddle" would mean a saving to the buying public.

Too many want the government in business when such action would be advantageous to them, but they would have the government stay out when it would be disadvantageous to them.

How Do You Argue?

By Ruth Taylor

How do you argue? Do you bluster and fume and try to talk down your opponent? Do you take keen pleasure in contradicting him? Do you try to make an impression by positive assertions and generalizations? Do you hammer home your points in emphatic, loud tones?

Oh, yes, to argue does mean to urge reasons for or against—but there is a second definition which is far more important—"to influence by argument".

Are you influenced by people who bluster and fume? Doesn't contradiction make you more set in your own opinion? Don't you resent positive assertions and generalizations? And don't you have to keep tight hold of your temper when you are hammered at in loud, emphatic tones? Then why think such tactics will win an argument for

As a great think once said: "It is one thing to show a man that he is in error, and another to put him in possession of truth." If you want to win an argument, first listen to the other fellow's side of the story. Find out what he is thinking, and why he feels as he does.

Once you know the whys, you will be able to determine what are the strong points in your case, and, if you have listened courteously to him, the chances are nine out of ten that he will listen to you. Don't assume he is all wrong. Just take the stand that here are some facts that have probably not come to his attention.

Talk firmly - if an opinion is not worth defending, it isn't worth having - but quietly, as to an understanding friend. State your case clearly, but stick to the point and don't over-elaborate. You are arguing - not making a speech. Give your opponent a chance to comment on your position. An argument has to have views both for an against. If it is one-sided, it isn't an argument.

These are simple rules to follow. If you really want to influence your opponent, then talk from his side 'c his interests. And this applies not only to personal discussions but to arguments between groups.

Maybe it is too Utopian - but could wars start so easily if nations argued this way?

Our deeds determine us, as much as we determine our deeds.-George Eliot.

From lack of moral strength empires fall. Right alone is irresistible, permanent, eternal.-Mary Baker Eddy.
