Behind the Scenes Effect of the War

New York, July 24 — The Korean war is the major key to business prospects again this week, and perhaps for many weeks, and perhaps for many U. S. troops still on the defensive, no quick mop-up of the Red-led North Korean forces is in sight, and the home front is acting accordingly. Retailers, for instance, are already beginning to feel the war's impact as some consumers rush to stock up. New York buying offices are urging the retail men to move cautiously, however. To quote a top executive of one of the leading firms: "It would be far better for all retailers to play a conservative role in this present situation than to speculate on merchandise and have large stocks on hand which may or may not be desirable at some future time."

One Retailer's View — Macy's, the world's largest store, took a foresighted step last week when it bought space in New York papers to tell people the facts about shortages. "There's no important shortage of anything," said the copy. "Our own counters are bulging with merchandise. In many, many lines, there's a surplus. . . . We believe any talk of genuine shortages is nonsense — and dangerous nonsense!" Here's a message worth noting by both customers and retailers. As Macy's pointed out: "America's productive capacity is at such a high level that it can cope with just about everything except a stampede of hoarding and panic buying."
