Seeking a Solution to War

The struggle today, in its essence, is not new. It is as old as man himself. It is the struggle for men's minds. It is the struggle between the authoritarian and the democrat...

We are still not winning that fight. In North America we are much more engrossed in what Stalin does than in what we ourselves should be doing. The result is that we are fighting against something instead of for something.

Therefore we have to find new ideas. We have to realize that the most important task before mankind is to find a solution to war. When we do that we shall have found the solution to poverty and also to communism.

After Ten Years

In February, 1941, U. S. Senator Robert Taft said, "It is simply fantastic to suppose there is any danger of an attack on the U. S. by Japan."

On down through that year, the Senator-prophet was hitting the "spot" with all his political ability. On August 1, a mere four months before Pearl Harbor, Mr. Taft was quoted as saying: "My opinion is that the situation looks infinitely safer."

Gradually, the Senator moved closer to Pearl Harbor but in reverse gear. He was quoted on September 22, 1941, well under three months from Pearl Harbor, as saying: "There is much less danger to this country than there was two years ago; certainly much less than there was one year ago."

Now, about ten years later, Mr. Taft dares go into book form with his foreign policy ideas. If they prove as foreign as his ten-year-ago ideas did, he could live long enough to regret ever having put them in such form.

First Impressions

Imperial Magazine It is a curious fact that our opinion of a strange city is almost entirely contingent on what happens to us during the few hours or days in which we are a visitor.

If our hotel is superior, or if we are entertained by congenial friends, or if we close a profitable business deal, we may cherish a friendly feeling for the community and everyone in it throughout our lifetime.

But if we run into bedbugs, bad food, loneliness, a boresome host, or a cold prospect, we put the town down as a place to avoid. It takes years to overcome these first impressions.

Another peculiar fact: it is nearly impossible not to think of a place as a fast, rich city if we happen to be entertained by a lively group in a wealthy suburb. Should our host ride to the hounds, we'll insist that such-and-such burg is a horse town.

It just doesn't occur to us that all towns contain all kinds of people, in about the identical percentages, and that all towns are alike if we make friends easily and are patient.

It's So!

The Christian Viewpoint

Some earnest thinkers are much concerned lest the greatly-prized American doctrine of separation of church and state should be misinterpreted to make religious teaching taboo in our public schools. "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion," says the First Amendment of our constitution. Justice Frankfurter and his colleagues emphasized that in the famous Champaign case. We need some emphasis on the statement which immediately follows: "or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." It was an inspiring sight to the writer to see about a thousand of the leading educators of the Southland stand during the singing of the Hallelujah chorus from Handel's Messiah in St. Petersburg. No church organization made them to do that. Their own program committee planned the banquet and invited the college choir. In the exercise of their freedom they presented one of the great masterpieces of religious music. It belongs to all men, who wish to rejoice in its glorious message. No petty sect can forbid its being sung. Our educators are free to cull from all the past the rich treasures which belong to all men. Our young people should be able to hear in school a presentation of the Psalms, the Ave Maria, or the Messiah. That can be no real education which quarantines our youth from the great spiritual experiences and expressions of the human race.

I am afraid of those who want to rule out information so as to keep people in the dark. "And this is the judgment, that the light is come into the world, and men loved the darkness rather than the light; for their works were evil. For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, lest his works should be reproved. But he that doeth the truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest, that they have been wrought in God." John 3:19-21. —Prepared by Department of Bible, Presbyterian Junior College, Maxton, North Carolina.

Human Relations

By Ruth Taylor.

Whether we are at war or at peace; whether we are prosperous or poverty-stricken; whether we are happy or depressed — all these things depend on our human relations. Here are ten points that seem to me important.

1. Human relations demand teamwork. Human relations are our relations with those with whom we live and work. If we pull together, we get along. If we pull apart, there is trouble. And we must do our share that we both may benefit. It is as simple as that.

2. The appreciation of human dignity is the basis for good human relations. This means simply—respect the other man and his viewpoint as you expect him to respect yours. It means something else as well. Have respect for yourself. You can be your own fairest critic.

3. Only when human relations are good can there be economic and social security. If we are to build for the future, whether in or personal or working lives, we must work from a common base.

4. Good communication is needed to establish good human relations. We must be able to speak with one another in a common tongue in order to understand the motives back of our speech. As we wish to hear clear talk, so must we learn to talk clearly.

5. Cooperation between labor and management is a two-way proposition. Both are partners in the larger scheme of our economy. When this economy becomes lopsided, when it is all one way—well, we have seen what happened in Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia! We don't want that!

6. Management has responsibilities as well as rights. The rights of ownership are the responsibilities of stewardship. Successful management realizes its responsibility toward the human beings who work for it.

7. Labor has rights as well as responsibilities. These rights are the same for all—rights to work at a fair wage under fair conditions. But successful labor leaders know that these rights are best obtained when their accompanying responsibilities are well fulfilled.

8. Production is increased and Prosperity is achieved by good human relations. Men work best when they are not worried. Increased production means higher standards of living and prosperity for all—not for a few alone.

9. Good labor-management relations — that is, good human relations—are the only cure for depression. We must fight poverty and wan together. We must cooperate. We must understand each other. Only in this way can depression for all be wiped out.

10. Good human relations are the exemplification of the brotherhood of man. "Do unto others as ye would that others do unto you" remains the best way of life. It is the basis of all religions. It is the base of all good human relations.
