STRANGER RESCUES FOUR FROM WATER THEN DEPARTS

Roanoke Island looked around Tuesday for a stranger upon which it wished to confer its solemn thanks and set down his name for a Carnegie medal, but couldn't find him. The last trace it could get of him was at the local ABC store where he appeared shaken and distraught and without knowledge enough of brands to tell Jerry Parker what it was wanted. This stranger, middle aged, saved four people from drowning early last night at the second bridge over Roanoke Sound. He was fishing from the bridge when he saw three grandchildren of Guthrie Midgett, and W. W. Ballowe sink for a third time in the deep, channel of Roanoke Sound. He dived in and brought them to safety and in the ensuing excitement slipped away. Passing by at the time was S. A. Walker, superintendent of the Pea Island game refuge, who lifted the three water-logged children, two of them twins, aged six, and the other eight, along with the father of the twins, into his truck and brought them to Manteo where Dr. Johnston drained the water out of them and put them to bed. The three children rescued were Pat Davis, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Davis, of Manteo, and Bobby and Betty, the twin children of Mr. and Mrs. Reuben Midgett of Norfolk, who are visiting their grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Guthrie Midgett. Mr. Ballowe, who made an effort to save the children, but who was unable to swim is a son-in-law of Mr. and Mrs. Midgett, from New London, Conn.

A Land Replete With Colonial History and Completely Equipped for Its Own Sustenance, Columbia Man Says

By DAVID STICK

The Southern Albemarle Region, comprising Tyrrell, Hyde, Dare and Washington counties may be characterized as the one region of North Carolina completely capable of self-sustenance, according to C. Earl Cohoon, prominent Columbia business man and political leader of Tyrrell county. Mr. Cohoon sums up the history of the region and passes to the main fact that this section is a complete domain of recreational facilities, healthful living, comfortable climate, and points out it is an empire of economic completeness. "Rich in woods and fields and waters that furnish fish, fowl and game—that furnish range and pasturage for livestock, we have a great advantage," he says. "Our supply of lumber is adequate for our needs for years to come. Our lands will produce all crops necessary to the sustenance of human life. I do not believe any section of the state has so many advantages. "Comfortable living may have made us too contented with our lot, and our satisfaction was taken to mean that we did not need the vast improvements created elsewhere in a changing world, and which our sections had become dependent on. "Surrounded by these changes we find ourselves outdistanced by counties with better highway and transportation facilities," he says. He then goes on to say the state would find the Southern Albemarle Region a rich asset if it took advantage of its possibilities and advertised it, and made it as fully accessible to travel as other sections are.
