A TALE OF WYOMING VALLEY. * Do you see that landscape ? said the man to me, as we paused upon the edge of the mountain read, and looked down into the Wroming beneath us. Well, that spot, calm and beautiful as it now is, was once the scene of massacre. God help mel the ago-nies of that day almost wring my heart to think of them, even after the lapse of fifty years. 'I have heard it was a fearful time, and you have often promised to tell me the tale of your own connection with it. Yet if the subject be so pendul to you, I dare scarcely make the Aquest.

No. boy, no,' said the old man, sadly; I will tell it, for the promise is of long standing, and likel to-day, as if I could narrate that tragely with less emotion than usu-al. Sit down on this rock and give me a mo-ment to rest; I will then commence my sto-

To our left rose up the mountain, bold, rugged, and barren, like the back of some vast monster reared against the sky—but on the right interposed to prevent the view; whose loveliness so far exceeded my expectations, that for some minutes I gazed upon the scene in mute admiration. Beneath me stretched the valley, diversified with gently sloping elevations, and sprinkled with fields of golden grain; while here and there a patch of woodland, with its dark green hue, lay slumbering on the landscape—the surface of the forest ever and anon varying to a lighter tint as the wind swept over the tree-tops. Right throught the centre of the valley meandered the river, now rolling betwint bluffbanks, and now stealing gently among the rich meadow lands in the distance, until at length it turned to the left, and striking the foot of the far hills was lost behind the profile of the mountain before us. In the centre of the vale was the village, with its white houses and airy church-steeple, smiling over the scene. Fur away on the horizon stretched a line of hills, their dark blue oung half hid by the clouds which wrapped then as in a veil of gauze. No sounds came from the valley. Occasionally the twitter of a bird would be heard through the sorrounding trees, while the low twinkle of a tiny waterfull on the left, kept monotonously sounding on our ears. The marning rays of summer's sun poured down upon the landscape, and every thing around was bright and gay, and beautiful. I was still lost in admiration at the loveliness of the scene, when the old man signi-

> 'It is now fifty years ago,' he be since I came to this country a young from man, with a hardy constitution, a love of adventure, and the reputation of being the best shot on the border; the place was at that time settled principally by families from Connecticut, and even then bore marks of its prese were in good circumstances, others had see better days, and altogether the society was more refined than was usual on the frontier. Among all the families, however, in the valley, none pleased me so much as that of Mr. Beverly—one of his fireside circle his second, Beverly—one of his fireside circle his second, daughter, Kate, was, in my eyes, the gem.— How shall I describe her heauty? Lovely, without being heautiful, with a sylph-like form, a laugh as joyous as the carol of a blid, a step lighter than that of a young faw in sportive play, a disposition so amiable as to win, irresistibly, the love of all who met her; kete Beverly was scarcely seventeen, before Kate Beverly was scarcely seventeen, b she had a host of admirers, and might have won any youth in the valley. Why it was that she preferred me over all the rest I cannot say ; perhaps it was the conscioueness of some mysterious sympathy linking us together, or perhaps it was that we both came from the same place in Connection, and had been schoolmates in childhood—so it was, however. Wilming on, N. C. It soon began to be known thoughout the valley that before another season should elapse, Kate Beverly would become my wife.
