With this regard, their making turn away,

And loose what they otherwise should have.

BY A. P. WHITE.

The cold, piercing winds of a December night whistled and t tered pieces of her sparse wardrobe into the fissures of the shattered door and windows, to exclude the nipping breath of 'Jack Frost,' as it oozed into her humble apartments; for the fierce winter king and his snowy train drove furies by the same his snowy train sured they will find shem perfectly reliable, and the medicine worthy their best coufidence and patronage.

From the distinguished Professor, of Chemisterous table before her, as she crouched small deal table before her, as she crouched in a low chair beside the expiring fire, dimly burned a lamp, while the benombed fingers of the widow, guided by her weary eyes, were plying over a half finished garment of a cheap tailoring establishment. Eyer and anon the poor woman would cast her ayes towards a large and ill-accountered bed, in a corner of the room, and as she did so, she would renew her wasted energies to complete her task. That humble couch contained all on earth that was dear to her best plete her task. That humble couch contained all on earth that was dear to her, her two children slept, nothing the less sound because of their wretched poverty, but slept that sweet and refreshing sleep that knuts up the ravelles sleeve of care, and falls as gently upon the beggar in his shed, as the millionaire in his palice. A subbing mone escapes the poor widow, tears suffuse her holdow checks.

I can work no more, my light is nearly gone. I'm chilled to the bone. But it what will my children do for bread to more row! They almost broke my beart when I put them to bed hungry and cold, to night To-morrow they'll have nothing no ford no fire. Grent God, they must not perphywhile I've an eye or a hand. And the poor woman, main plied her naedle, nodded, nobbed, nighed and worked on, until the fact ember of her fire was gone. The light, of the lamp flickered in the socket for a moment; and the last stitch in the gurment was completed as the faint streaks of day broke through the interstices of the windows. low checks w . . .

ment; and the just stich in the garment was completed as the faint streaks of day broke through the interstices of the windows.

Pale and wan, as if death had already claimed his demand; almost us rigid with cold, too, the widow arose from her sear, crossed to the bed gazed upon her still quietly sleeping children and falling upon her knees beside them, she prayed—prayed that God would call them all home, as nothing but despair and misery seemed before them. But the sun began to spread his broad raye over the frozen earth, and the hum and roar of a busy city resounded again in the streets. The poor woman donned her plain habitments, kissed her waking children, and bilding them sleep until the returned with food and fire, she rolled up the finished garment and started, through the deep snow and keep inorning air, to the tailoring establishment. It was one of those large depots where ready made clothing holds out such great allurements to the economical wearers of such goods; a long-established and tolerated species of latter-day Bustile, for the torture of those poor females who fight to the last, against most overwhelming odds and chances of a wretched existence, in defence of their honest poverty, and a parity of purpose, which when preserved searce attents and honest poverty, and a parity of pure which, when preserved, senree attracts a sing commendation; yet, if last, all the state of the land, and parity and vote fail not to state in the heart's core misery-gooded wretch. She stood beside
