THE

POR THE COMMERCIAL BY A LORG CREEK CORRESPONDENT.

CHAPTER II.

e marchant urged on by an unlucky sity, had ventured out upon the point of rack, whence the horizon presented a deciledly magnificent and sublime appearance; but the awful precipiees, by which it was surrounded would consign the rash romantic intruder to its eternal enjoyment.

How the devil did you get up there?' inuired Victor, amszed at the rash, wild darg of the old man.

'Ah faith ? because as I ascended, transported with the magnificence of the scene that was bursting on my view, I did not once consider the difficulty of a descent.

Welt, well-let yourself slip, I will eatch

'Much obliged; a person of my age does not slip but tumble." "Ah, that is quite different, well wait, hold

Then having quickly traversed the space that intervenes, Victor stretched himself down and clinging with all his might to the fissures of the rock, reached one hand to the merchant.

'Now, said he, let yourself go, I will not lose my grip, no miss my aim-the mountain will sooner full with you."

'That is not likely,' murmured the old man, accepting at the same time the invitation of his liberater.

While the poor man was being congratu lated in the arms of his idaughter for his miraculous escape, Victor having descended. mond by, wrapped in an exetacy of twofold appiness, bring in the presence of her whom Lie heart wershipped and adored; almost encircled by the halo formed by the rays cmanating from her loveliness, and passing thro the prismatic medium of her pearly and joyous tears; and enjoying, besides, the luxury of those feelings and emotions that ever progaed from the consciousness of having performed a generous, noble and humane act.

'Sir,' said the merchant, you have saved my life; it was in imminent danger; I have not to his years? His forehead, formerly narrow words sufficiently adequate to convey you my grateful feelings. May I ask to whom I am so deeply obliged ?

'To Victor de Carvelles,' modestly replied

The particle that adorned the name of our traveller had a magic effect upon the mer-each other again. You are residing in the village, I presume ?, 'Not immediately,' answered Victor.

His dwelling was not indeed in the village. but a little above it. Whenever you shall happen to be passing by the hotel of the White Horse, I request you will not forget, on any account, Mr. Auvray, of Bordeaux; that is my name.'

Victor assented to this kind and grateful invitation, and added an amiable smile in return for the interest and partiality which the young girl testified for him.

Two hours after, Victor de Carvelles accidentally passed by the hotel, but he did not enter; he only glanced at the house; the interral that had elapsed since their last interview, being so short. The next day he felt less scrupulous. The visits of the young man were, at first, somewhat angelic, but at last they became long and frequent. Victor ardently loved the old merchant's daughter, and was equally loved by her-ignorant of that despicable, deluding art, called coquetry, she did not conceal the sentiment that was glowing within her bosom, nor strive to repress its gushing emotions.

At length the bothing senson like all finite sublunary things terminated—the moment of separation arrived? 'Victor,' said the merchant one day; accept my farewell salutation, 'My daughter and I leave for Barages to-marrow! You are returning to Bordeaux ? asked Victor, his face suffused with deep show her the capital, besides, I have some husiness of importance to transact there my-We are going to Paris! 'To Paris? * * but I am going there too. If you would allow me to accompany you, you would save me the regrets of your absence." My dear Mr. de Corvelles, that would give me the greatest pleasure! but all the posthorses are engaged, and I have been obliged to take the only two seats that were to be disposed of in the public coach !"

·How unfortunate ! interrupted Victor. But if you should succeed in procuring the means of rejoining us, here is my address. You know your presence will always con-

This interval appeared to him as age, and more than sufficed to convince him how deep od ardent was his love. 'Oh P (exclusioned mes to hinself) of what a monopolaing and selfish nature is love! How insipd and unintercating is every thing in the absence of its object ! Would that the human heart had not such tender susceptibilities! Woold it had been either invulnerable to the rude assaults of Capid's wanton shafts. or that there had been such a constitutional arrangement made that it could never be separa'ed from the object of its delight!

Victor having arrived in Paris, proceeded directly, himself, to leave his card at the residence of the old merchant, to inform him of his return, and to prepare him for the visit he intended to pay as soon as possible; after which his mind was more composed and tranquil; he returned to the hotel of the Four Nations where he was first introduced to the

'Sir,' said his servant 'a gentlemen has been to see you' 'His name ?' inquired Victor.

'Faith, Sir, I do not know, but he is one of our best friends.'

One of my best friends? murmured Victor, astonished. ·Yes Sir.'

Well that will do. You may retire. I wish to be alone.'

The docile servant then opened the door and withdrew; and Victor weary and exhausted from the fatigue of travelling, sank carelessly into an arm chair. But ne had been scarcely seated, when the door opened and the servant entered.

'Sir,' said he, here he is.'

Who ? 'The person that was here this morning. 'My best friend ?'

'Ah! introduce him.'

'Yes Sir,'

Then the servant having stepped aside, the little old man, still covered with dust and perspiration entered. At his appearance Victor was disconcerted and involuntarily stood up. 'Mr. Benn;' exclaimed he, and then feel back, greatly effected into his chair

Mr. Benn, whose sudden and abrupt at pearance has not permitted us up to this, to sketch his likeness or to note the peculiarities of his physiognomy, was a man already in the decline of life; his extreme emaciation. which it is said, is a powerful antidote against. and an efficient medicine for the evils and infirmities of old age, sufficed of itself to preserve him in a state of health proportionate and of limited surface-like all those of vulgar capacities, had been worked so hard for some time past in the acquisition of property, that it now included within its domain a great part of the occiput and parietals Two grey and bushy cychrows suspended from his bald and withered cranium, like a few briery brambles sprinkled with snow on the 'Sir,' continued he. 'I hope we shall see side of a barren rock, indicated that the wintry season of life had long since set in. In fine, the deep wrinkles of his face, void of expression and character; the last sadsymps. tom of approaching dissolution-completely proved the decrepitude and imbecility of the little o'd man. Notwithstanding, Mr. Benn preserved, interiorly under this worn, shrivelled, corporeal envelope, a juvenile ardor that showed itself now and then in the vigor and vehemence of his wotion and in the fierceness and fire of his look. The ardor, that men usually evince under the influence of each of their various passions, appeared in Mr. Benn only when under the influence of that for money-the lowest and meanest of all. With such propensities men go to great lengths; at first they treasure up in the chest; then they lend out by the week, and should they have bumps of covetousness. they rob. Mr. Benn did not go so far as that; be was afraid; but he devoted himself, with so much ardor and ability, to usury, that, in a few years he accumulated a very considerable capital.

Victor was not the last to experience the costly compliances of our usurer, and the latter, encouraged by the respectability of Victor's family and the wealth of the notorious uncle of Burgoyne, did not deem it prudent to reject a business in which the improvidence of the borrower left him an unlimited range. He thus lent him to the amount of more than thirty thousand france. But as the young man was continuing to have recourse, without scruple, to the fatal purse, Mr. Beon began to feel uneasy, and finally refused to comply with his reckless demands. Victor returned no more, and it was the usurer that had to go to him; Victor begged time; it was granted, but nevertheless he was unable to liquidate the debt. Mr. Benn became menacing.

Mr. de Corvelles soon perceived that the contest was not equal! he therefore fell back and it was then he commenced that long retreat which we have seen accomplished thro' Europe in general and at Barges in "JUNIUS." (To be continued.)
