THE BETRAYED

On a fine moonlight night, just previous to the restoration of Charles II, a young man of gentlemanly appearance was walking rapidly towards the village of Charings had dress denoted that he was of the sect of the puritans. It was Edward Maraton, a wid-ower, with one child, whose household was under the direction of his sister Grace.

He had proceeded for some time in his solitary walk, when a hand was haid upon his shoulder. He started, and turned: it was his uncle Martin. ·Uncle, he exclaimed, what brings yo here at such an hour ? To tell thee that the Commone of Er and Monk have betrayed their trust and, re-called Charles Stuart to the throug of his fathers.

I have heard as much. England is Low no place for ne. You and my late father ea-judges on the tyrant's trial. 'Edward,' said his relative, thou art but lukewarm. But the Lord hath reproved thee. Hath He not smitten thee in thy feetions ? 'He hath ! groundd his nephew, with glance at his mourning garments. She loved is in her grave?

'And thy sister,' added the old man, bitterly, the child of her who, bore thee is dishonored l' What mean you?

That William Clayton even now is in her chamber, despite my warning. They would shelter him, and the proud fool his brothe Like a screent he has stung you?

I must have proof of this?

Thou shalt watch with me,! enid 1 man, sadly 'and be convinced of the d of thy blood! Drawing their swords, they concealed them selves behind a portion of the garden was from whence they could see the window

Grace's aportment. Grace Marston was, despite her purito blood, as lovely a creature to look upon a earth could boast. She had won the hear of the young royalist, who was her brother's friend and guest, and yielding to his solicita-tions, had weakly consented to a secret marringe. There might have been-nuy, there was-imprudence in the net-but no di honor! Unfortunately his clightly visits to her chamber were discovered by her juncte hiring servants; renting houses-or any other Martin, a jealous puritan; and the storm was

As guardian of his niece, he instantly prevented all persibility of her committee. of her communicating with her hucking whom he branded as her brother a murdere and affected to disbelieve her marriage.

Poor Grace was truly wretched! Richard and William returned to Londo where they assisted in the restoration of the king, after several vain attempts to eee Gra-Marston. In the gay court of the licenmonarch, the brothers moved with eclas; ternately the companions of Charles' picaures and conneils, honor and appointme were lavished upon them with an inconsid were lavished upon them with an inconsiderate hand; both rose to high military command. At length, when time had sufficiently effaced, the memory of Grace, Williams again began to indulge in thoughts of level Ellen Digby, the only daughter of a staurary royalist, was the object of his choice.
