KOSSUTH AND THE HUNGARIAN

GRATION.
To the Editors of the Courier & Register.
The Tribune and the Times are the only reason for the cool reply which has been given to the Hungarian Emigrants, they had asked him for money. When the only reason, there would be an enemy at hand. But there is quite another reason, altogether beyond and inasmuch as it is inherent in him, his malimed and blind ambition. Who has watched him closely cannot but be convinced of his melancholy. The wretchedness and the broken Hungary, and the consequent degradation of Europe, are, in a great measure, due to him. In order to attain his aim, he had submitted to the Battyany's, with the view of securing their plans. They purchased the counties in several counties to enable him to obtain there the right of voting. Having acted accordingly in furthering the programme of the liberal party (through the influence of the aristocracy, in opposition to the royal party,) he was elected Deputy for the great County of Pesth. No expense had been spared by his patrons to bring about his success.

While the Battyany's were indefatigable to carry the measure of reform in the Upper House, Kossuth acted in the same spirit in the Lower one. All went on prosperously in favor of liberty, and Louis Battyany became President of the newly created Hungarian Ministry, with Kossuth as Minister of Finance. The former conducted the policy of the country with moderation and prudence; but Kossuth influenced the people beyond measure, without calculating unavoidable mischievous consequences. Remonstrances of the more cautious patriots were of any avail against the pertinacious obstinacy of the more verbose than logical tribune, who profiting by the credulity of the brave people posited them on heading into a warlike attitude. The consequences of these rash proceedings very soon manifested themselves.

Those very means by which rulers always carry their ends, and which had been usually resorted to by Austrian statesmen, were thus, so to say, invited into play; the maxim "divide and conquer" was put into execution, by pitching one set of inhabitants against the other. Kossuth had more confidence in his oratory, than foresight and sound policy. It was thus that the inhabitants, speaking different languages, and who always had acted in common for their native country, became implacably hostile to one another. All efforts at reconciliation, made by the clearer-sighted patriots of either side, were wrecked on the recklessness of Kossuth who never was accessible to any wise suggestion from any quarter whatever.

A recapitulation of the melancholy results of Hungary's misfortunes is not needed, as they are of world wide notoriety. Under the specious pretence of rendering the Hungarians more renowned, though their history, natural character and geographical position make up for their numerical inferiority, giving them that importance which statesmen should have availed himself of for the real benefit of them as well as of the other Hungarians; he was the foremost in excluding the other nationalities, and in dividing the forces of the country, which had (he been united in the pursuit of their common undoubted rights could have victoriously withstood the united forces of Austria and Russia.

The possibility of this is plainly shown by the declaration of these powers of their inability of directing the affairs of Hungary at their pleasure in 1845. To the extent that had been caused by the just, honest and popular measures above referred to, between the old conservative aristocracy and the progressive democratic party, was regarded to the more fatal hostility of the Serbs, and many Slovaks; the Valachs and the Transylvanian Saxons against and to the greatest detriment of those very Hungarians, of whom Kossuth boasts to be "the great one." No one could have more fully neutralized their great value in the political system of Europe; none could have given a more incorrect idea of Hungary in the world than Kossuth has done. His incessant blowing upon the string "great Hungary," which is held stretched in tune by the Times and the Tribune is but a mere name—naught to expose to ridicule the steady and laudable measures, to expose those hostile feelings against them which they do not deserve, and which only serves to render the whole country divisible by the stomach of the imperial eagle.

The diet was willing to make terms with Austria, for the sake of preserving peace, and Louis Battyany was sent by the National Assembly to Windgratz, at Pesth, for what purpose? When Battyany found that he was to be chosen he thanked for the trust which the people put in him. His expressions were: "I go, as if my duty, as the welfare of my country requires; and if I must die, I can also do that."—The latter words came to a fulfillment, through the hands of Austria.

Also, Battyany's claim, who was in the greatest danger as a representative for Slavonia, when he was in the Fortness of Seged, surrounded as he was by his enemies, and he received no help which he several times applied for, he was forced, as a last resource, to leave the fortress to enable for the reason, as shortly after the Fort was obliged to surrender.

Kossuth had now the whole field open before him until he was checked again, but it is quite different way. Gogry another copy.
