Reference has of late been made to the Revolution of the 18th Brandier; but we have not noticed any account of the way in which it was effected in any of the newspapers. A most vivid description of it was given, by Sir Walter Scott, in his life of Napoleon. We extract from it a few puragraphs. Napoleon, who was in Egypt, at the head of the French army, immediately after the famous battle of Aboukir, determined on placing himself at the head of affairs in Frances Without asking leave of absence, he deparcing himself at the head of affairs in Frances. Without asking leave of absence, he departed for the French capital and made his appearance in Paris. He was received with great rejoicing, and introduced to the Council of Five Hundred, datermined to abolish that body, as well as that of the Anciens, and assume the character of Dictator. After a good many preliminary steps, he entered the half of the Legislature, when the following scene transpired:

ing scene transpired:
He was received with load murmurs. He was received with load murmurs.—
"What! drawn weapons, armed men, soldiers in the sanctuary of the laws,! exclaimed the members, whose courage seemed to rise against the diplay of force with which they were menaced. All the deputies arose, some rushed upon Bonaparte, and seized ham by the collar, others called out—'Outlawry—outlawry—let him be proclaimed a traitor!' It is said that Arena, a native of Corsica like himself, aimed a dagger at his breast, which was only averted by the interposition of one of the grenadiers. The fact sceme extremely doubtful, though it is certain that Bonaparte was seized by two or three members, while others exclaimed—'Was it for this you gained so many victories?' and loaded him gained so many victories? and loaded him with reproaches. At this crisis a party of grenadiers rushed into the hall with drawn swords, and extricating Bonaparte from the deputies, bore him off in their arms breathless with the scuffle.

It was probably at this crisis that Augereaus's faith in his ancient general's fortunes began to totter, and his revolutionary principles to gain an ascendency over his military devotion. 'A fine situation you have brought yourself into,' he said to Bonaparte, who answered sternly, 'Augereau, things were worse at Arcola—Take my advice—remain quiet, in a short time all this will change.' Augereau, whose active assistance and co-operation might have been at this critical period of the greatest consequence to the Council, took the greatest consequence to the Council, took the hint, and continued passive. Jourdan and Bernadotte, who were ready to act on the popular side, had the soldiers shown the least hesitation in yielding obedience to Bonaparte, perceived no opening of which to avail themselves.

The Council remained in the highest state of commotion, the general voice accusing Bonaparte of having usurped the suprome authority, called for a sentence of outlawry, or demanding he should be brought to the har. Can you ask me to put the outlawry of my own brother to the vote? Said Lucien But this appeal to his personal situation and fellings made no impression upon the Assembly, who continued clamorquely to deman description they will offer inducements equal to the question. At length Lucien flung on the any establishment either North or South. Please desk his hat, scarf, and other parts of his give us a call before purchasing elsewhere. official dress. They were at first received with applause; for the Council, accustomed to see the triumph of democratical opinions among the military, did not doubt that they were deserting their general to range themselves on the side of the deputies. Their appearance was but momentary—they instaatly left the hall, carrying Lucien in the centre of the detach-

Murat, deputed by Bonaparte to exthe command of Lucien, entered the Orang ric, with drums beating at the head of a de tachment with fixed bayonets. He summen ed the deputies to disperse on their peril, while an officer of the constitutional guard called out, he could be no longer answerable for their safety. Cries of fear became new mingled with vociferations of rage, executions of abharrence, and shouts of Vive I Republique. An officer then mounted the President's seat, and summoned the representatives to retire. 'The General,' said he, 'has given order.'

Some of the deputies and spectators began now to leave the hall; the greater part conwhich they reprobated this military intrus The drums at length struck up, and downed
