From the Southern Literary Messenger of May last. WOMAN'S TRUE MISSION.

OB "THE NOBLE LADIES OF ENGLAND." Honored be woman, when, with un-'shrinking eye, she looks out upon the broad world before her, and clearly discerning her own peculiar path, walks therein with a duty-doing spirit and a humble heart. phases of mother, wife, daughter and sister. When true to the instinct of her own kind nature she seeks out sorrow to miligate it ; administering to the sick ; bestowing the precious balm of sympathy on the sorrowing; and relieving pain and misery wherever it is to be found. I hrice honor ed is she, when sacredly fulfilling Charity's behests, she listens also to the more earnest invocations of Home. Happy is woman if she cannot only thus clearly define her duty, but also faithfully perform it.

But alas for these days of Bloomerism and Woman's rights, when everything has a progressive movement, and woman, determined not to be outdone, puts on her seven league boots, and takes long strides to keep up with the glorious march of masculine mind. There was a time when nature drew the circle in which woman was to walk, and Education taught her how to keep within its bounds. But the march of improvement has trampled out the lines, and woman wanders where she will,

"The world is all before her where to choose. Is it a marvel then that she sometimes strays into man's domains, as in the recent case of "the noble ladies of England; who, donning bonnet and shawl, turned remorselessly the key upon their lords, leaving them to sing in fatherly tones soft 'cradle songs,' whilst they sent loud wailings over the broad Atlantic. Gathered together in solemn convocation, they framed a pathetic petition, an earnest appeal to their American sisters, who were living in perfect ignorance of the evils which they were so meltingly called on to redress, Fired with indignant fervor, each fair phi lanthropist seized the goose quill, and to the moving address inscribed her cognomen. The effort over, and they sat down to gaze upon a collection of names, the owners of which had never before come together, and, perhaps, would not then save for the levelling principle, that would intermix black and white indiscriminately, on the great chequer-board of life. Here, then, in the lengthened columns, stand their names; very much as did those in Hood's 'black job,' where certain
