THE PROMISSORY NOTE.

A GERMAN Baron, Von D-, at present residing at Paris, was some few years since living in baronial ease at his Castle of F-, situated in a somewhat secluded but romantic district of his native land .--On the score of worldly possessions, fortune, had smiled most favorably on the hero of our narrative; but, by way of amends, nature had been proportionably inauspicious the adornments of the outward man. In ality of the auspicious change in his apsober truth, the Baron Von D-was about the ugliest man that Germany has produced for the last century and a balf at presented himself among them. This time the least; so ungainly, indeed, was his ap-pearance, that, with a full consciousness of matter. From whisperings and other inbis inferiority in this respect, he lived in a manner secluded from society, to mix in which his rank and station otherwise fully entitled him. Like his storied prototype, fell over head and ears in love-a predica-Teutonic barons, are occasionally not exdaughter of a gentleman of goodly pedigree, but of slender fortune, living in his immediate neighborhood, was the object of his adoration-the cynosure of his reveries. Thenceforth his mind, his every thought, became fixed, absorbed ---as it were, equally divided, between her slyph-like image and his beloved meerschaum: nor is this, by the way, by any means a disparaging compliment to the lady, when speaking of a German lover. Having by a mighty effort of resolution, such as the tender passion can alone inspire, surmounted the bashful diffidence to which we have before alluded, the baron made his proposals in form, which, on the part of the parents of the young lady, were most favorably and glad-ly received. With the lady herself, how ever, matters fell out far less prosperously; a cold reception to his proposal, and a chilling demeanor, afforded but too certain an will fall a lifeless corpse on the very steps indication that his suit was disagreeably of the altar. Be careful, therefore. The and his attentions irksome Still haunted by the painful consciousness of his personal defects, the baron was very naturally in public all claim to the hand of the lady, led to attribute his failure to that cause - and recommend her parents to sanction her A far different motive, however, lurked at the bottom of the young lady,s conduct -A cousin (oh! these cousins!) had long been, in secret, the favored suitor; but the narrowness of whose prospects in life had hitherto precluded all hope of his wishes meeting with the parental sanction. The Baron Von D-was one evening seated, as was his wont, in his antique chair, in the spacious hall of his ancestral dwell ng, in one of the wide recesses of the huge gothic chimney, before the dull embers of a wood fire, smouldering, like his own illstarred love, in a shapeless heap, in sole companionship with his beloved and inseparable meerschaum, his second passion-musing in sad and melancholy revery on the unstable composition and thoughtless vanity of the female heart, when half mentally and half audibly he ejaculated his willingness to sacrifice the better portion of his fortune in exchange, if that were possible, for the boon of personal attraction and exterior endowment. Suddenly, in the dim twilight, and through the dense volumes of smoke, curling in rapid succession from the volcano of his pipebowl, he perceived a tall and singularly accoutred figure standing erect beside him, as though it had issued from one of the huge gothic mouldings. Somewhat startled at the appearance of the unexpected visiter, he was about to call for his attendants, when the stranger, with a polite bow, and in a voice which, although of peculiar tone, yet be-tokened no hostile purpose, thus addressed 'My visit, Herr Baron, is perhaps somewhat unceremonious; but I come with a
