MISCELLANY.

EXECUTION OF A MURDERER.

The Obedient Plain Dealer publishes the following account of the execution of James Parks, for the murder last summer of a man by the name of Beaton. His speech on the scaffold is quite touching, and will be read with interest:

Execution of James Parks—Address to his Friends—The cause of the Attempted Suicide—His Reticent Declaration of Innocence—I Die an Innocent Man—The Closing Scene.

Parks rested tolerably well during the night, sleeping several hours. He was attended by persons connected with the jail, who did everything to make him comfortable, by administering medicinal draughts of wine and water. On waking, the idea that the morning had dawned upon the day of his execution, seemed to flash upon his mind, and he made a slight attempt to get at the bandages on his wound, but it was a momentary emotion, and he resumed his cool and calm demeanor.

The structure upon which he was to be executed had been put up this morning on the north side of the jail, and consisted of a platform six feet by eight, about eight from the ground, having two trap doors with a jointed support which could be easily removed by touching a lever in the rear with the point of a cane.

He inquired towards noon whether Mr. Wright the clergyman had arrived. No clergyman was present.

At ten minutes before noon he was conducted upon the scaffold by Mr. Seward, the Sheriff and Marshal Fitch. He walked feebly but without any emotion in his countenance. He took a chair provided for him, drank a portion of a glass of wine, and held the glass in his hand while he prepared to speak. He was quite pale, but his whole air was remarkably firm and clear minded. A deaf and dumb person, who had returned the signal with apparent satisfaction at the friendly tokens. He commenced some remarks in a strong and clear voice, the substance of which we will attempt to give.

He said, "Well, gentlemen, there are but comparatively few present, and my words will be but few. I shall detain you but a short time.

If I wished to say more, I have hardly strength to do so. I see among you some of my jurors. I have no reflections to make upon the verdict; you did your duty. I have no levity to show on so solemn an occasion. I should have been glad to have spared the people the horror of an execution. My attempt to do so yesterday by ending my life by my own hand, was for my own benefit, but the sake of those I love behind me. I know how the old time feelings of pride have prevailed. I had hoped to prevent my child and relations from the reproach which this will bring to them. I knew I was not a murderer, and had a right to dispose of my existence as much as the laws and society had a right to do so. I had not done ought to break the laws or offend society. I have not imposed upon others or myself in this affair. That man Beaton fell and killed himself. I might say so much, commend myself to God and stop here. It is said that I have had two unequal trials, that this ought to be conclusive. But, gentlemen, the trial by jury is not yet perfected, human approaches to truth are but difficult and uncertain. I regret that I am not understood, that the best of my mind and the scope of my understanding are misunderstood. I never dreamed of murder; my conscience never would have dared to consent to it. That I murdered Beaton for his money is absurd. He was a poor man, with less money than I. He was not rich, and his friends have never made themselves known, though it is but a short journey from England to Ohio. I had no magnificence towards him, and feel none towards any human being.

I have a dear wife who has in my long confinement been an angel in her solicitude and care of me. I had never known her virtues had it not been for my sad misfortunes. I have a dear infant who has been taught to clasp its arms around my neck and whom I love dearly. I leave aged parents now near eighty years of age, from whose kind hearts I had hoped to keep the sad news of the fate of their son. Their hearts were broken and burst in tears. I was for the sake of all these things I attempted yesterday to shorten my life a day. I feel that I did right, and I hope that those who report for the public prints will, if they have regard for those I love, spare them if possible from the pain of seeing my name coupled with that of murder. I have suffered much mentally and bodily by my confinement; circumstances have had much to do in making me improperly understood. No innocent man put upon trial can be certain of acquittal. He labors under great disadvantages, a thousand circumstances arise and spread, through the world in the public prints. In his cell, shut out from a chance to meet the unfavorable suspicions with the antidote, he is borne down with these prejudices which have taken possession of the public mind. He cannot efface this first impression, he is a victim of it, and to-day declares himself innocent, and to-morrow is pronounced a monster, hyena, blood hound, murderer, black, blacker, blackest of the guilty. What right had they to say what I intended to gain by killing Beaton? Man's mind and intent are secrets; no man can know them.

After speaking twenty minutes he took a sip of wine and rested a little, and asked the Sheriff if he was too long for his presence, and being assured that he was not, went on:

"I had hoped to have spared you this deplorable scene, but to the regret that I cannot spare my wife and child this shame, is that I leave them in a land of strangers, destitute and almost friendless.

I should be glad to unfold to you the feelings that a man entertains on the three
