Like all young mothers she was par ticularly sensitive on the subject of her children, and quite reluctant to admit any comparison to their disadvantage. She would fain regard hers as model boys, a great improvement upon past generations, and yet she honored the opinions of her guest, and wished to have his approbation. A few moments since, and her three boys had made their presence sensibly felt in that now A few days quiet room. Had you looked in then, you would have seen the eldest, a lad of thirteen, with his hand upon his mother's shoulder, reading from an open letter which she had before her, while he made comments in no gentle tone; the second son in the centre of the room, snapping the long lash of a whip, to the very imminent danger of sundry vases and mantle ornaments; while the yougest stood at the half open door, beaing a loud tattoo, occasionally interrupting himself to say: "Boys, do come; I tell you the governor (a respectful term he says we must be there soon, or shall have to walk instead of ride."

These discordant sounds had not been quite unheeded, even by the fond mother. More than once she had put down her letter and said, "Don't Georgy. don't snap that whip; go, Charles-don't you hear your father is waiting for you;" but until they were guite rea- he had such excellent judgment, she aldy, the youngster did not move.
