

MISCELLANY.

From the Weekly Clipper.

FITZADDE'S TRANSIENT LOVE.

BY WILLIAM H. TOLDRIDGE.

The heart of Frederick Augustus Fitzadde was filled with pride, awe, fear, genuine, savage pride. A rich old uncle of the young gentleman, who was noted for his eccentricities, the most prominent of which being his love for money, and weakness for wearing dirty shirts, taking it in his head to die, made his will in the presence of a one-eyed witness, and then, with a grim smile of satisfaction hurried to that bourne from whence no miser returns.

Mr. Ralph Spitzback, the lamented uncle, had lived in New York; Frederick Augustus dwelt in Philadelphia—consequently as the Aforesaid Spitzback died two minutes after the hopeful nephew received the telegraphic dispatch, containing the afflicting (!) intelligence, it does not stand to reason that Frederick could be at the death-bed of the uncle.

But our hero broke not his heart about this mournful incident.

Consequently the pride which struggled in the bosom of the young man was based upon Mr. Spitzback's timely departure from this "wide, wide world."

"How so?" asks the reader.

I will tell thee in the deep, pathetic style of the novelist:

"'Twas night; a calm, beautiful eve that called forth the poet from his sky-tipped saucium (atic) to dream of love, bliss, the queen of Poesy, and how he could pay his washer-woman on the following day; a night when the lover's guitar wailed soft, airy notes on the perfumed air, rivaling e'en the tones that issued from the symmetrical mouth of Sarah Jane's gouty Thomas-cat; a night which called forth the young, the old, the gay, the sad—all to drink in the beauty of the evening.

All, did I say? No, not all, for in a small, round-shouldered bed-room, on a chair, supported by a dangerous-doubtful set of legs, sat our hero, Mr. Frederick Augustus Fitzadde. He was pale; as pale as the poet, who, having with a romantic soul and dirty face, composed three hundred and twenty-five verses, finds they don't "read right."

Three days had elapsed since Frederick's uncle had departed this life, and our hero was anxiously awaiting to hear of the contents of his will. During these three days he had been politely discharged from the store in which he was employed for softly pressing a lady's hand while showing her the texture of a pair of gloves.

Fitzadde was in despair. His parents were dead, and he had now but thirty, wasted her love upon a pair of long-tailed, cross-eyed Tom-cats, and a dog with a turned-up nose, low legs, and a tail which, not condescending to wag, stood out straight like a fishing pole, and looked extremely russy.

Frederick had incurred his aunt's wrath by maliciously spitting a mouthful of fiery tobacco juice directly into the right eye of the little dog with the unmovable tail and bow-legs. Words ensued, and the aunt and nephew parted forever!

This afflicting incident happened two months before we have introduced Frederick to the reader. As our hero sat in the hypocritical chair above mentioned, thoughts of his situation, lost to him forever, rushed upon his heart; and with a low, deep, thrilling sigh of anguish, he thought of his fat land-lady.

A knock was heard at his door. "This she!" he murmured in a tragic voice, folding his arms, and looking like a real actor. "Come in, thou sorceress! I fear ye not!"

The door slowly opened; but no land-lady appeared. In her place was a young boy with a note in his hand. "Thoughts of the washer-woman's bill was rushing o'er the brains of our hero, when the lad, placing the letter, or note, on the chair from which Fitzadde had sprung on his entrance, uttered "Telegraphic notice," and departed.

Fitzadde was a man, but nothing more so, while his hand grasped the note his form trembled with emotion; and he tottered to the chair. Another moment, and the note, torn open, was before his gaze. With a beating heart he read the following:

July 12, 1854. Sir—I hereby write to acquaint you with the fact that your uncle dying, has bequeathed unto you (his only nephew, Frederick Augustus Fitzadde) in his will, his wealth and property, amounting to one hundred thousand dollars.

I remain your ob't. serv't. THOS. TICKLETOE, Attorney at Law, No. 14, Snooks' Lane.

Fitzadde read the glorious news. His face grew red and white by turns. What! he, the self-off clerk, the store snob, a wealthy man? How small and mean his room now looked! How bad he felt in his unbecoming clothes, he would go to the Springs—he would make a tour—he would. But the picture of future joys were too bright; and throwing himself on his bed, he, the now wealthy man, wept tears of happiness.

Thus was the heart of Frederick Augustus Fitzadde filled with pride.

His clothes are cut in the most fashionable style, his hair duto; and he sports a fierce moustache. In his hand he held a small carpet bag. Fitzadde was going to visit New York. In a few moments his carriage drove up, and springing in, Fitzadde was soon hurrying to the depot.

Now it so happened that Miss Sarah Jane Fitzadde (our hero's aunt), had hit upon this very day for visiting a maiden friend in New York. Dressed in a bewitching manner, and closely veiled, the maiden aunt hid farewell to the twin cats and the bow-legged dog, and soon after was comfortably in the cars.

A few minutes after the train had left the depot, Fitzadde strolled slowly in the ladies' car, and seeing a vacant seat beside his aunt (whom he did not know) he gracefully threw himself into it.

Now, be it understood that the aunt and nephew had not seen each other for six months. During the last four of those months, or, since Frederick was wealthy, he had cultivated his manners and voice to such a degree that even his aunt would not know him. Her veil hid her face from his gaze; and as he had taken several parting drinks with his friends, he was too much muddled to recognize her voice were she to speak.

A gentle blush stole o'er the maiden cheek of Miss Sarah Jane as she saw a handsome man, with such a love of a moustache, gazing admiringly upon her.

"Oh! dear me! how my little heart throbs," sighed Sarah Jane Fitzadde.—"He looks a little like my hateful nephew, but so much handsomer!"

"A pretty formed woman, 'pon my soul," thought the young blood. "She may be an heiress—who knows?—I'll push myself forward, spite me!" And saying this, Frederick Augustus leaned gracefully forward and said in accents soft and sweet to Miss Sarah Jane:

"A beautiful morning for travelling, Miss?"

"Yes, sir," sighed the blushing maiden, in a tone of thrilling softness.

"Beautiful scenery, Miss," continued the young blade, pointing through the open window.

Sarah Jane looked, but the scene was gone, and she could see nothing but shiny oak, dead grass and stagnant water.

"Beautiful, indeed," replied the maiden, a little surprised at his taste.

"Bound for New York, I suppose?" asked Fitzadde with rather a thick utterance; for the liquor he had taken with his friends was beginning to take effect.—"He felt in a very loving mood, indeed."

"Yes, sir," returned Sarah Jane, "I am going to visit a friend in that city."

"Who is the fortunate (hic) person, if I may be allowed to ask?" uttered Fitzadde, who was now truly fit for it.

Surprised at this question, and the manner in which he asked it, Miss Sarah Jane Fitzadde gazed with a timid, sleepish expression upon our hero.

"He surely must have fallen in love with me!"

The above conversation was carried on in a low tone of voice; and the fellow travelers had taken no notice of our hero and his unknown aunt. Frederick knew this, and growing bolder as the liquor coursed through his veins, he leaned forward till his nose nearly touched Sarah Jane's veil, murmured "Angel—honey-pot—fish-ball!" and gently placed his arm around her maiden waist.

Sarah Jane was an old maid. Never before had masculine encircled her form with his arm. The feeling was new—novel. She was gradually melting before his silent arguments and eloquence; but her maiden dignity preserved her in all danger, and turning to the enamored youth, she murmured—

"Oh! you ought not!"

"Say not so, my gentle Juliet," replied Fitzadde. He was now slightly intoxicated. "How's the old man?" he continued, leaning softly on her; "and the children—and the cows, and the pigs? All well, I hope, most worthy duchess?"

"I do not understand your questions, sir," returned the lady; "and I am no lady of rank, though I'm far from being poor."

"Rich, hey?" uttered the stupid blade, "rich? Then let's fly to some sunny isle, where the birds sing and the roses spring up under your very feet. Say, my gentle Juliet? What say you, old gal?"

Sarah Jane could no longer disguise the fact that her enamored 's'wain was intoxicated; but then he was so soft, so gentle; his manners so winning, that she loved him still.

"Juliet, what's your name?" uttered our hero, with his eyes half shut.

"Sarah Jane," softly returned the ancient maiden.

"How sweet—how low (hic) ly! almost snored Fitzadde. "I have an ugly old aunt named that. She's an old maid." "And she has a name like mine. Ha! ha! ha! The laugh was hysterical. Suspicion of evil was in the heart of the ancient maid.

"Oh! I hate her! Fitzadde uttered.

"Do you! Ha! ha! ha!" Her eyes were glancing very sharply at our hero. "Take off thy veil, sweet nymph; that I may be dazzled by thy beauty."

the other's hand, and burst into a loud, clear laugh. And never before had the aunt and nephew been on such good terms as after Fitzadde's transient love.
