POETRY.

From the Charleston Courier. A MOTHERS LOVE Life's but an endless night; A path with beacons few and far between ; And they, the gifted men, whose light, Like glow-worms briefly seen, Rise here and there with feeble ray, Guiding the pilgrim for a moment on, Then in the deep night-shades forever pass away, Forgotten soon as gone.

But ah ! for those that knowing feel And truly prize the value of a mother's love, There is a moon whose soft beams steal With rays divising from above, And lends us ou with cheering beams To endless joy's immortal goal, Where day reigns over with unfading scenes, And night no longer blinds the soul.

Though low'ring clouds of deepest gloom Brood warring night around, and crush each hope, scarce in its bloom, With helpless wo unto the ground ; Still, still this pale moon sheds its light-Shines forth with tender brilliance-in each ray, When deepest lies the soul in shades of night-In shades that never pass away.

Pure branch of that celestial stream, Whose waters give unfading bloom, Unbroken harmony which reigns supreme In fields that know not winter's gloom, And down whose limpid channels float Bright flowers scattered from the tree of life, Upon each leaf a mission wrote, By angels to aliay our strife :

To cheer our hearts whene'er they sink Beneath life's load of cars ; To teach the mind how it should think-How combat with oppressive fear. O I thus does our Father speak From his great throne on high, By the cheering smile upon a mother's cheek, By the soul which speaketh in her eye.

MOUNT PLEASANT, March, 1856.

From the Journal of Commerce. LIGHT. I glory not in wisdom, I glory not in might, I glory not in riches, but I glory in the light. Light shines upon the mountain, it beautifies the plain, It glitters in the fountain, and gladdens all the main. The bow from heaven depending, its varied hues hath The flower fragrance sending is with its colors wrought. The day all gold at dawning, doth set in crimson light, And bright the coming morning succeeds the darkened Light springeth from the sun, it worketh on the earth, Its toll hath scarce begun e'er nature brings to birth. The insect, humming, winging its rapid way in air, The planted seed upspringing, the ripened fruit to bear. The preying bird lond screaming, and songster of the field, creatures countless seeming, that earth and water yield. The planets, too, are going unchangeably their course, In azure swinging, showing light, their glory's source. Father, lowly bending, I bow before thy throne And still thy Spirit tending to lighten me I own. Thy Spirit is my wisdom. I glory in its might, I glory in its siches, and I glory in its light. J. L. DUELLING.

During the period of the occupation of France by the allies of Louis XVIII., in 1815, this system was pursued extensively by the French officers. Patriotism and a deep sense of injury perhaps palliated its atrocity. Day after day, Prussi n and English officers would be grossly insulted by Frenchmen-would send a cartel-fight -and be carried off regularly to Pere la Chaise. Some of Napoleon's mailres d'armes made a business of killing their man each day. A story is told of one of them-an old Capitaine Ducroc-who had slain his scores, and was never known to meet his match with the sword. He never sent a manding position among the cities of the challenge, was always the aggressor, and nation. He was many years a resident of pitilessly insisted on the right of choosing Virginia, and at the age of thirty entered his favorite weapon. When he had not the service of Washington, of whom he refound an adversary in the course of the day, he would enter the Cafe Foy, at Paris, toward six o'clock, for dinner; and the waiters could tell by his face and the way the Father of the Country. With Revoluhe twirled his grizzly moustache that he tionary incidents he was abundantly supwas on the look-out for a quarrel. One evening, there chanced to drop into the the country, although but a man of color same cafe an English officer named Gwynne. He belonged to the army of occupation, but had only just returned to his regiment from his home, where he had been kept a close prisoner by a wound received at Waterloo. During his absence, his brother had had the misfortune-so he had heard-to quarrel with Capitaine Ducroc. and to be killed by him in a duel.

Gwynne entered the Cafe Foy a few minutes before six, and sat down at a small vacant table. A waiter started at the sight, and running to the Englishman, observed. with some agitation, that that was "the Captain's table " "What Captain, my friend ?" asked the Englishman. "Oh! le Capitaine Ducroc !" answered the waiter. life, which had burned so long brightly. Captain's table " "What Captain, my friend ?" asked the Englishman. Gwynne's cheek flushed at the name, but he merely observed that "this table was like all the others, seemingly; still," he said, "if the Capitaine insisted upon it, he would doubtless satisfy him '
