A Worth-While Undertaking

The proposed project to build sheds along bus routes for the thousands of North Carolina school children should be pushed to completion as rapidly as possible.

Attendance facts and figures are not at our hand, but it is known that when a child stands in the rain, sleet and snow, waiting for a school truck to pick him up, and contracts pneumonia and dies, parents of other children have cause, and just cause, too, to turn against school consolidation.

The general transportation system has been devised to a great extent by those far removed from the muddy roads traversing the backwoods section of North Carolina.

Yes; the transportation of school children is costing a tidy sum, but not near enough is being spent for that one item to insure the health and safety of thousands of little children who ride school busses in nearly every nook and corner of the state.

Gladstone May Have Been Right

William E. Gladstone, the great English statesman, was perhaps more nearly right than he knew, when he looked at the boy Edward—later Edward VIII—and remarked, "There is England's last king."

On this side of the Atlantic it is pretty generally believed that Edward VIII was forced from the throne not because of any domineering spirit or rash rule, but because of his liberal democratic spirit, his love and respect for the general run of common people, and because he chose to marry a woman not of royal blood, a commoner from America.

Perhaps the former king did right in choosing to follow his own desires and let the self-styled elite continue to rule the English empire under the iron-clad customs and traditions of former years instead of letting the people rule.

Gladstone must have foreseen the commoners demanding the right to choose their own ruler, rather than submitting to the dictation of certain lords and rulers. This may lead to unprecedented trouble in the British Empire.

Empires and kingdoms have crumbled and monarchs have fallen for far less cause than the simple deposing of a king. The men who have fought the wars and done the work and built the kingdom may yet have something to say about what kind of government they choose to live under.

Few Have Gone

Several weeks have passed and none of those big boys threatening to leave the country if Roosevelt was reelected has departed for foreign parts.

Probably they do not like Spain's revolution. Hitler in Germany and Mussolini in Italy must not appeal to them. Russian Communism, at one time declared by them to be pure democracy compared to the state of conditions existing in this country and to what might be expected, turns out to be not of their liking.

England, with its social security, higher income taxes, censorship of the press, and an unfortunate love argument, pans out to be a good place to be from and not a good place to go to.

Mrs. Roosevelt Not "High Hat"

The newspapers recently reported a little item, within itself of no importance, but newsworthy because even the simplest acts of occupants of the White House are interesting to American people.

It seems that a Norfolk school teacher was spending the Thanksgiving holidays with relatives in New York, and while there attended a theatre in the Broadway district. Much to her surprise, she found herself seated next to Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, wife of the President, who by chance had purchased the adjoining ticket.

The democratic Mrs. Roosevelt herself opened conversation between the acts and, upon discovering the calling of her neighbor to be teaching, the two ladies chatted away during intermission about that and kindred subjects.

Whatever else her critics may have to say of Mrs. Roosevelt, no one can accuse her of being "high hat."
