Wild Geese On Way Southward

The wild geese are flying southward. Of course, they always fly south about this time of the year, so the flight is not unexpected. But it marks the approach of colder weather. Other migratory birds are also on their way to lands where snow and ice do not disturb them, but their passing is not so noticeable as the flight of the geese, so less attention is given

Fires on farms take approximately 3,500 lives and destroy about $100,000,000 worth of property each year, says R. W. Graeber, Extension forester of N. C. State College. "We cannot spare the manpower or the timber this year," he said, "because all human and forest resources are needed to win the fight for freedom against the Axis enemies. A cigarette butt, a lighted match, or a smoldering campfire may aid the Axis."
