Mummy Kept Alive 3,000 Years in Film

According to all reports, moviegoers are due for an exciting time when Universal's new thriller, "The Mummy's Ghost" shows at the Plymouth Theatre at the Owl Show Saturday night.

Lon Chaney, who has created many blood-curdling screen characters, is said to outdo himself as Kharis, the 3,000-year-old Egyptian mummy, who has been kept alive through the centuries by a secret brew. Kharis finds his way to America in search of the sarcophagus of his beloved Princess Ananka, which was brought by Egyptologists to the Scripps Museum.

Influenced by John Carradine, in the role of a sinister Egyptian priest, the Mummy murders everyone who violated his Princess's tomb. When the Princess is discovered to be reincarnated in the lovely person of Ramsey Ames, a college student, Kharis and the priest work out a diabolical scheme to recover her spirit. "The Mummy's Ghost" is reported to hold in suspense and thrills any horror picture yet produced.

Cassidy Western To Play Here Saturday

During the filming of "Lumberjack," the Hopalong Cassidy western thriller starring William Boyd which is to play at the Plymouth Theatre Saturday, an extremely hazardous scene was filmed on a small ledge which dropped away for hundreds of feet into the valley below.

The story called for "Hoppy" (Bill Boyd) to gallop up on his beautiful white horse, Topper, and out of the retreat of his enemy at the very edge of the dangerous ledge. Producer Sherman, thinking the stunt too perilous for his star hired a stunt man to do it. But he reckoned without Topper, who is Boyd's own horse. Three times the crew tried to get the scene on film and three times Topper, sensing the danger of the drop-off, stopped too short.

Boyd, realizing that Topper did not trust his new rider, decided to put over the stunt himself. The result was not only a perfect take, but an exciting bit of action that held the onlookers breathless.
