OUR RALEIGH LETTER:

Raleigh, March 14, 1921 — The city of Raleigh does not show the signs of life that she did a week ago. The legislators and the lobbyists (of which there was a large number) are gone. A few of the members lingered to say goodbye to their friends, but ninety-five per cent of them boarded the first train for home immediately after the curtain fell on the session of the general Assembly of 1921 at two o'clock Wednesday morning of last week.

On the whole, the recent session of the Legislature wrought well. It established a record in the matter of appropriations for the State's educational and penal institutions; for pensions and for the construction and maintenance of an elaborate system of public highways. The members took Governor Morrison at his word and has made possible of accomplishment many of the progressive ideas advanced in his inaugural address.

Fifty millions of dollars for roads would have been unthinkable eight, or even, four years ago. Not so in the year of Our Lord 1921. The people of the State had made up their minds to taboo the mud tax and their representatives in the General Assembly knew what they were doing in the action taken when the road bill came up for consideration. A bare handful in each branch voted to "let well enough alone." The progressives won easily and the people will cheerfully sustain their action.

And the folks were not interested in roads only. They had very decided views looking to the future of the higher institutions of learning and adopted a robust program to start things going on a really big scale. Twenty million dollars were asked for to be expended over a period covering six years. The Legislature did not think this wise and adopted a two-year program and appropriated more than seven million dollars to meet immediate needs. This decision is generally approved.

The public schools of the State also fared well at the hands of the General Assembly of 1921, which provided a fund of five million dollars for school buildings in needy communities. It also appropriated $1,400,000 as an equalizing fund and to defray the expenses of the State Board of Examiners; to pay salaries of county superintendents and take care of various agencies which contribute to the advancement of the public school system.

Another problem which appears to have been amicably adjusted by the solons recently assembled here is that of the valuation of property by local assessors under State direction. No little complaint has been heard relative to values put upon the real property of the State last year when prices of everything had reached their highest level. Eastern Carolina farmers are facing bankruptcy because of the rapid decline in prices of cotton and tobacco and have been insistent upon a revision of assessments. Their appeals reached sympathetic ears and the Revenue Act for county boards of review, which are to meet on April 5th for the purposes of revision is provided. Any citizen who feels that his land has been assessed too high will have an opportunity to speak his mind upon the subject. These boards of review are required to report their findings to the State Tax Commission not later than April 20, so it will be well for those who may have complaints to offer to be on hand promptly at the appointed time.

The Legislature also provided for bringing the manless job and the jobless man together by the establishment of a free employment bureau in the Department of Labor and Printing under the direct supervision of the head of that department. This bureau will serve all classes ployees. Other legislation will be discussed from time to time.

WOMEN OF THE SOUTH IN WAR TIMES:

Attention, Daughters of the Confederacy and all those interested in the history of our country.

This book, whose title is given above, has been recently published under the auspices of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. It consists of a collection of stories of personal experience compiled and edited by Matthew Page Andrews.

These stories, which would "read well" in fiction, with the added merit of actuality, must grip all true Southern hearts.

And not Southern hearts only. Truth is truth, and honest minds and true hearts the world over must respond to these acts of devoted heroism.

In this connection we quote, in part, the comment of the Boston Transcript: "Ideas maintained in the Northern States concerning the people of the South, in the days of the Civil War were, in many cases, undoubtedly superficial; years have passed since the surrender at Appomatax, a new generation has been born and grown to maturity, we have had time to think.

"It is well to look back upon the war days from the standpoint of the South and, so looking, we may see some features once hidden from our gaze and may understand more fully the position of those whom we once regarded as devoid of all honesty and faith.

Hence, it is well to read these reminiscences, written by women of the South, in whose minds the days of the early sixties are yet vivid recollections. . . . Most valuable footnotes to history are these records here brought to light and offered in so kindly a spirit, a spirit from which the last trace of bitterness seems to have disappeared and been forgotten."

Such testimony is proof enough that "Women of the South in War Times" is not a raking up of ancient grievances, but an honest narrative, plainly told, for the enlightenment of the present and future generations.

The United Daughters of the Confederacy have published the book with two objects in view; as a contribution to history and as a memorial to those who "made every heroic sacrifice through four long years of war and ten of reconstruction;" some of whom are still living.

Will not such a memorial be more inspiring, more lasting, than a tablet of marble or of bronze?

In the foreword, the editor states briefly the "True Cause of the Sectional Conflict;" a dry fact occasionally overlooked by historians, fictional writers and others.

Subscriptions for "Women of the South in War Times" will be taken at the U. D. C. Library. The small percentage allowed by the Publication Committee goes into the fund of the local chapter.
