High Up On the Mountain Crags

The bird adopted as our National emblem—the eagle.

High up on a jutting crag—far from the haunts of man—the eagles rear their young.

No protecting walls between the wabby, teetering little eaglets and the storms that rage. The lightning may flash, and thunders roll, but each successive flash reveals them huddled together, their piercing little eyes unblinking. By no mistake of judgement will they venture too near the edge of their bleak and rugged home. Their protection lies within them—their fear of the yawning abyss below.

But the time comes when the parent birds know that the young eagles must use their wings. Calmly they push their young off the ledge—and they must fly. In this manner they have their first opportunity to try their wings.

As usual, there is a little lesson for us. It is so obvious that it is not necessary to comment upon it. We offer the suggestion, however, that our Savings department, where interest is compounded each three months at four per cent, is a splendid place for the child to develop his habits of thrift. Let him try his wings, as he grows up. Do not reserve for him the rude awakening which awaits the eagles.
