Find Relics of Prehistoric Race

Tennessee Latest to Yield Treasures of Historic Value.

Chattanooga.—Was the genus homo cradled in the heart of the Cumberland mountains in eastern Tennessee? This is the startling question which archeologists may begin to ask themselves following the discovery by P. E. Cox, state geologist of Tennessee, of evidence which he thinks may establish Pickett county, Tennessee, as the "cradle of mankind."

Professor Cox's research seems at least to establish that here in the heart of the Cumberland mountains was many thousand years ago a human community which had emerged into tribal consciousness, but had by no means made the racial progress attributed to the famous Solutre men of France.

The discovery was first made known to the Tennessee archeological experts about the middle of January, and Professor Cox and his assistants have just completed an investigation.

Among other things they have found hieroglyphics of human figures, cut in the "sandstone" that are probably thousands of years old, and graves which indicate many prehistoric burial customs, at this colony between the Wolf and Obed rivers in Pickett county, Tennessee.

Professor Cox has discussed his find thus:

"Much has been written as a result of archeological exploration in Europe, tending to establish Europe as the most ancient home of man. Practically all of the evidences on which this theory is based has been procured from caverns in France, Germany, Austria and Belgium.

"Evidence, it is believed, of an equal antiquity of man, has, within the first weeks of January, 1925, been discovered by the department of archeology. A survey was made during the week ending January 9, 1925, of the caverns, mounds and evidences of habitations along the Wolf and Obed rivers.

Discovery of Ancient Rock.

"In Pickett county, within the first weeks of January, at an elevation of approximately 1,000 feet, there was discovered an enormous round set rock about 40 feet in diameter, so located that an unobstructed view for miles, even to the lofty range of the Cumberland mountains, is presented; about 100 feet below this stone is a beautiful battlement; on the north side of this stone are three manmade holes, round and symmetrical, 5 inches in diameter, about 2 feet apart, cut to a depth of 18 to 24 inches; on the edges around this stone are thirty smaller holes of lesser depth; on the face of the stone are twelve pits or ovens of an average diameter of 2 feet, about 6 inches in depth, all of which have been burned; on each of the sides of this stone are ancient arrow designs pointing to the north, south, east and west; there are also inscribed thereon ancient single line human figured designs and lines indicating counters; these counter lines do not exceed ten in one group; this ancient stone monument is almost covered with these ancient markings, which appear on removing the moss growing and attached to the stone.

"The exposed portion of this stone is approximately 13 feet thick, and immediately under its shelf burned human bones were discovered; this stone is apparently the southern exposed edge of the cliff, below which, about 800 feet, Obed river flows, the cliff being almost perpendicular; this stone is exposed on both the east and west, there being a narrow point extending toward the southeast, the area immediately on the summit covered by this entire stone, some of which is not exposed, is about three acres. A hurried examination disclosed several hundred pits cut in the stone varying from 1 to 4 feet in diameter and from 6 to 10 inches deep; numbers of these pits have connecting conduits cut in the rock; most of all the pits show the effect of fire therein.

"At the extreme south point of the cliff and about 20 feet below the summit there was found the entrance to a large cavern; at about 15 feet from the entrance two avenues or passageways appear, leading into two separate chambers; the interior is perfectly dry and the floors are covered with ashes, which had not been opened more than 2 feet; human skeleton matter, flint implements, pottery and burned human and animal bones were found in this ash.

Many Skeletons Found.

"A man who assisted in this exploration said that a great number of human skeletons were found; that the entrance was closed by stones set in place, which he assisted to remove; the cavern walls show evidences of fire; on returning from the entrance to the cavern, to the monumental scene, an ancient single line arrow was found, the pointer of which was directly to the cavern; on observing on the monumental stone a single line arrow pointing toward the northwest, we followed this lead, and at a distance of about 500 feet discovered an entrance to another cavern, the entrance closed by stones which had been placed. Not being equipped to remove the large entrance stone, no examination was made of the interior of this cavern.

"All of these pits are cut in a sandstone rock, evidently because this stone withstands fire action; the greater part of the stone in this section is white and blue limestone, but the ancient selected this large area of a sandstone surface to utilize the pits, a great number of which contained ash and charcoal. These pits were evidently used either for ceremonial and sacrificial purposes or for communal cooking purposes.

"This monumental site was most probably used for ages as the home of the ruler, who no doubt occupied as his home the large flat monumental stone, the holes therein being used to erect therein the standards or insignia of authority.

"Many ages ago, no doubt, this stone, now almost covered with ancient pictographs, was the scene of the weird and primeval ceremonies of a people whose antiquity is probably equal, if not superior, to that of any prehistoric European people. The writer has been unable to find any record of there having been found, in any part of the world, such quantities of pits or ovens cut by human hands and when the monumental stone and burial caves are found in the immediate vicinity, there is at least established long occupancy by a large population, and the custom of using caverns for burial purposes, as well as the fact of closing the cavern entrance.

Huge Cavern.

"Located a short distance to the northeast of the above described site is a cavern having an opening of more than 200 feet across, above which, at a height of about 100 feet is the natural stone roof; thousands of tons of rock have fallen on the dry floor, and beneath these fallen stones is a floor of ashes from three to six feet deep; excavations disclosed hearths, ash and charcoal commingled with burned and unburned human and animal bones, flint and bone implements, broken pottery; the area of this ash is approximately two acres under the shelving rock and outside the darkness of the cavern; no exploration of the interior was made.

"From enormous fallen stones twenty-nine skeletons have been removed from stone graves; a great quantity of flint, bone and stone implements were found, as well as thousands of bone and shell beads. None of the skeletal remains were preserved by the excavator, so it was not possible to acquire any knowledge as to the cranial or other peculiarities. Across the gulch from this entrance is a large rock shelter, the floor covered with ash and evidences of fire. The roof and sides of the cavern bear evidence of long use of fire, and the slight excavations, clearly establish human occupancy.

"No careful excavations have been made to discover animal skeletal remains, which would tend to fix chronology by the fauna.

"Between the two described sites on the summit of a high hill washed by Obed river is a summit deposit of limestone shelving rock about one mile in length. A hurried examination disclosed great quantities of ash with which is found burned and unburned human bones, broken in small pieces, along with flint and pottery fragments; long use of fire is indicated on the sides and roof of the shelves; numbers of human skeletons have been taken from this site along with perfect pottery, in many cases the urns being filled with beads made of shell and bones; in some instances thousands of these beads are broken in two pieces, a condition not heretofore found east of the Mississippi.

Mr. Pao Chun I, who pronounces his surname "E," is twenty-four years old.

Bodies Wrapped in Skin.

"In this district and beneath the shelving rocks, it is reported, there was discovered and removed from the ash beds the remains of a human being carefully wrapped in the skin of a fur-bearing animal, which was placed beneath mattresses made of cane interwoven. The body had been clothed with a garment made of threads, which threads were made of the inner bark of trees and, woven with the fiber, bird feathers were found. This burial method, and particularly the custom of weaving bird feathers in the thread, is recognized as being used among many prehistoric races in different parts of the world, the chronology of which is reasonably well established.

"It is evident that these people practiced the custom of removing the flesh from the bones of their dead; probably burned the bones and then they were piled in the caverns and, after having placed in an urn or some receptacle food for the spirit on its journey to the final home, sealed with stone the entrance to the cavern, thus indicating the belief of an existence beyond this life.

"Along the valley of Obed river are numerous earth mounds, similar in appearance to those of the middle basin of Tennessee, carrying evidences of agriculture.

"The marked difference between the cave dwellers and the mound occupants is the absence of any evidence of agricultural pursuits by the cave dwellers.

"Central and South America are being diligently explored in the effort to find the evidence of the cradle of civilization. Europe, Asia, Australia, Africa and the islands of the seas are being examined and explored for a like purpose.

"Within the confines of Tennessee are known evidences of human occupancy and utilization by prehistoric man, at a date when he existed by the fruits of the chase long prior to the advent of the races that followed agricultural pursuits."—New York Herald and Tribune.

Old Vienna Bell Is Now Operated by Electricity

Vienna.—After 50 years of silence, "the growler," the great bell, weighing 21 tons, which hangs in the tower of St. Stephen's church, is again in use.

Ringling of the bell was discontinued half a century ago because it was feared the swinging of the huge mass would bring down the tower. An electric striking apparatus which enables it to be sounded without danger, now has been installed.

While the tone of the bell in the vicinity of the church is but a rumble, its notes at a distance of five miles sound clear and musical.

Everything in existence deteriorates.

COCONUT KING GIVES $2,500,000 FOR HUMANITY

Plans to Train Youths and Start Them in Business—Gives to Employees.

New York.—Leopold Schepp, known as the "coconut king," has set aside $2,500,000 of his fortune to carry out philanthropic plans for the "betterment of humanity," it became known here. Part of his fortune will be used to establish a foundation for the benefit of worthy boys of New York, he announced.

Mr. Schepp recently distributed $22,900 to the employees of his firm. The employees, old and young, received gifts of from $500 to $1,000 each. Two years ago he made a similar distribution of $110,000. He subsequently established a pension system by which the beneficiaries, including servants in his home, receive monthly checks which aggregate thousands of dollars. He plans, by his foundation for the benefit of boys in New York, to launch youths in a life of usefulness, if they prove worthy after a probation of two years. Youths between the ages of thirteen and sixteen years, of whatever creed or nationality, will be eligible. Each will be required to sign a pledge for two years, which will include abstinence from liquor. If the youth lives up to his pledge, he will receive $200 and be started in any business or calling that he selects. The foundation will be governed by a group of directors.

"I expect to get these boys," said Mr. Schepp, "by writing to the ministers of churches and Sunday school superintendents. It will be an association of endearments. They must be of good health, physically and mentally, so as to grow into the best kind of young men. It will be nonsectarian."

"I hope to set an example for other employers and capitalists who may wish to do something with their sur-
