

WONDERFUL SCENE AT CLOSE OF MEET

Hundreds of People Pay Tribute to Rev. Baxter F. McLendon at Great Falls

Great Falls, S. C., Oct. 30.—While five thousand people were waving their handkerchiefs and singing, "God Be With You Till We Meet Again," the curtains were rung down on Cyclone Mack's evangelistic campaign here, bringing to a close the most remarkable and memorable event in the town's history. The scene was one which marked the blending of tears and smiles, sorrow and joy, happiness and heart aches that comes at the time of parting with new made friends. For more than an hour after the benediction, great crowds remained to shake hands, say good-bye and to express words of appreciation to Mack and the individual members of his party. There is no doubt about it, the Cyclone Mack aggregation certainly carries away with them, the best wishes and the prayers of thousands of people in the continuation of their wonderful work.

A survey of the cards made today indicate that as a result of the campaign, more than 500 new members will be added to city churches, 200 or more to rural churches, while churches in Chester, Lancaster, Wigginsboro and other towns near here will receive something like 125. More than 800 reconsecrations were registered, making a total of approximately 1600 conversions during the five weeks of the campaign.

A parade, led by Mack and Chief of Police, J. C. Steele, to the afternoon service, consisting of the converts of the campaign, was approximately one mile long. In the procession were old men, old ladies, fathers and mothers, and in some instances entire families, with but a very small crowd of children bringing up the rear of the march.

Chief J. C. Steele who last Sunday announced a tremendous reduction in the number of arrests and fines paid, said yesterday that not a single arrest or a fine had been made during the last week of the campaign. This, he said, is something never before heard of in Great Falls. Chief Steele's remarks were directed to the good that McLendon's campaign had been to the town.

When the Boys Got the Joyful News

Nine years ago, November 11, 1918, much of the civilized world forgot nearly every other emotion except an unbounded joy at the news that an armistice had been declared in the World War. Photograph shows a group of men of Company M, Sixth infantry regiment, Fifth division, stationed near Remoiville, France, upon receipt of the news.

does not like to recall the face of the German machine gunner as the bayonet passed through his throat. All soldiers who had any considerable amount of combatant service have similar memories. They might be the scream of a mule on a shell-wrecked road; the ludicrous tumbling of a man blown in the air by a high explosive shell; the face of a stricken comrade gradually turning black from a hemorrhage; the feeble struggles of a mortally wounded soldier trying in vain to get on his feet, or the hammering of the barrage in his head, or aching fatigue.

Whatever the memories, they were of incidents the soldier would like to forget. Multitudes of them were in the minds of soldiers when the armistice was called. That was why, when they climbed out of the stinky mud or shell holes and stood erect on November 11, 1918, there was nothing in their hearts but a boundless gladness that at last the infernal thing was over.

Perspective Now Possible. With such thoughts fresh in his mind it is surprising the veteran soldier did not like to discuss the war with folk who spoke of going over the top as a game? But nine years have gone by and slowly tongues that were bound have loosened. War is not all horror. Little by little the amusing incidents began to be told, the man who went to sleep while putting up barbed wire in No Man's land and had to be hunted for; the blithe some details of the first and second A. W. O. L. evenings in Grandmère's kitchen; the squad sent out to suppress a machine gun that found it self in a patch of ripe blackberries, and stayed there.

Time blurs the sharp edges of horror and the mind recalls the lighter things. So with the war. It is only recently it has been talked about again. First the amusing happenings and lately the realities have been told.

Not merely the soldiers, but all the peoples engaged in it never wanted to bear the word again, when the war ended. But the parade of years has placed the great conflict far enough away from us to be seen. Stories of the war appear in magazines, in books on the stage and in the movies, and everywhere the effort has been to achieve realism. The literature of the war is grisly literature. There is no place in it for the poisonous roman history that seeks to glorify war as the natural test of national manhood.

Thought for the Day
Armistice day! Just one minute we give that day . . . to those who

NOW THAT NINE YEARS ARE GONE

Armistice Day Is Largely a Time of Personal Remembrance.

Nine years ago the armies of the allies and of Germany were engaged in the last battles of the World War. The armistice called on November 11, 1918, has as yet been only an armistice—a stacking of arms—with peace on earth existing precariously at times and in various localities.

By custom Armistice day has become a day of remembrance. We stand for two minutes silent, to reflect on those years. In all the confusion, distress and poverty, left as its aftermath, the purposes for which, presumably, the war was waged have been pushed aside by more immediate pressing problems of national interests caused by the war.

There have been riddles of economics, politics and national and personal ambitions, to add to the confusion. Combined, these clashing forces have rendered impossible the fulfillment of our war aims and much of the time have so obscured them that we forget what they were, or that we ever had any.

Desire to Forget War. Americans have had another obstacle to a clear understanding of the war. The battlefields are in Europe, inaccessible to us, except for tourists, but a constant reminder on the European's doorstep. Save for families and friends directly interested we see little trace of the effect of the war upon our men. We have been prosperous. Our skins were hardly scratched by the war. And we recovered quickly—so quickly that the war seems like a bad dream we wish to forget as soon as we may.

The shouting and tumult have died. Armistice day has become a time of personal remembrance, dedicated to the individual. We lay our offering of respect at the tomb of the Unknown Soldier in an effort to demonstrate our admiration for the endurance, courage and determination of common men. We do not send up paeans for our glorious victory, for we are sure neither of the glory nor the victory. Rejoicing at the end of a dreadful nightmare was the general emotion at the close of hostilities and it has remained the common sentiment.

Now the world is recovering slowly from its shell shock and we begin to see the war in perspective as the thing of horror it was. After the armistice it was safe to assume that those soldiers who had had most active service, talked least of their experiences. There was nothing they could say, except to tell the things they were trying to forget. Memory of war to them was mental anguish.

Memories of Horror. The sergeant of infantry who remarked, "I never thought, back in Boston, that I could ever bayonet a man, but then I had never led a platoon against a machine gun nest and had half of them knocked off."

The Eleventh Hour

Armistice day marks the celebration of the closing of the World War—11 minutes after 11 o'clock, morning of eleventh day of eleventh month 1918.

ASSURED FOR STATE

Raleigh, Nov. 2.—A state-wide organization of farmers in North Carolina is assured through the action of the organization committee which met at State College on October 11.

This organization committee came into being as a result of a conference of representatives of farm organizations which was held following action taken by the farmers of North Carolina at the last State convention. The committee last week had a harmonious meeting in which friction predicted over the adoption of the American Farm Bureau Federation as the national organization to be brought into the state failed to develop. The committee agreed that steps would be taken immediately to begin the organization of farmers and that this organization work would be done by the farmers themselves. An executive committee of nine members was appointed to work out plans of procedure. The plans were adopted by the general committee.

In general, the plan is to federate communities and neighborhoods into a county organization with a regular adopted constitution and by-laws. This county organization is to be known as the Agricultural Association of . . . County. When 25 counties are so organized, the committee will form a state organization to be known as the North Carolina State Agricultural Association. In any event, this state-wide association will be formed following the organization quarter which ends on April first. Then the state organization will adopt its own constitution and by-laws and will decide whether or not it wishes to affiliate with any existing national farm organization.

At the same time an organization of the business groups of farmers will be formed and this, together with the new organization and the old organizations such as the Alliance, the Union and others, will form a state council of farm organizations. Chas. F. Cates of Mebane is chairman of the organization committee.

SOYBEANS IN CORN INCREASED YIELD

Raleigh, Nov. 2.—Soybeans planted with corn has increased the yield per acre of the corn in at least one instance in North Carolina.

The demonstration was made by W. M. Green of Troy in Montgomery county. Mr. Green began a soil building demonstration with county agent O. R. Carrithers last spring. He planned to build up his soil by including soybeans with his corn so that the crop residue might be turned under. No soybeans was planted in part of the corn for purposes of comparison.

According to E. C. Blair, extension agronomist, at State College, who reported the demonstration, where no soybeans were grown, Mr. Green planted his corn in rows, four feet apart with the stalks standing 20 inches apart in the row. In contrast to this, he planted the other corn in rows six feet apart and 20 inches apart in the row. Then on the same day, he planted the rows of soybeans between the rows of the latter corn. This gave the same number of corn hills per acre whether with or without soybeans.

All the corn was fertilized alike. This means that the corn and soybeans received one-third more fertilizer an acre because the rows were closer together. The corn made good growth under both conditions. The soybeans grew from four to five feet high and spread enough to completely cover the ground. After the corn was ripe, says Mr. Blair, two rows having soybeans between them were gathered and weighed against three rows without the soybeans. The yield per acre was 35 bushels of corn with the beans as compared to 25 bushels per acre without the beans.

Mr. Blair states that in addition to the 10 bushels of corn gained per acre, there will be added benefits in years to come due to the great amount of legume vegetable matter plowed under this fall for soil improvement.

It is almost as difficult to hide a cough as it is to hide love.
