Just Beyond the Hills

By JOHN SMITH (Copyright.)

FROM her tiny room in the upper half story of the old farmhouse, Sarah for years had looked out across her father's acres to the hills beyond.

"What lies on the other side?" Nobody knew how often or how bitterly Sarah had asked the question.

For Sarah was nearly thirty and no one had ever said to her, "Come, beloved, put your hand in mine and we will go see what lies beyond those hills."

Any hands that Sarah might have clasped belonged to the stolid, grim sons of the soil who lived in the neighborhood and whose one ambition was to wring out of their forebears' land all the living they could.

The one of them who had himself known similar yearnings had indeed gone beyond the hills but he had never come back, much less shown any desire to hold any girl's hand—at least, so far as Sarah knew.

However, Sarah at last was going herself. Little by little her chicken and butter money, hoarded for years, had grown into a sum large enough to pay her fare to the city some hundred miles away and to support her for a time until she could find work.

Sarah's hopes were fixed on securing a position with a millinery or dress-making business. She was a skilled needlewoman.

A week—three weeks—a month in the city went by. And she had found nothing.

It was during a moment of despair—yes, and of unconfessed homesickness—that she dropped into a drug store and looked up the name of John Hobarth, who had come to the city two years ago.

When she had found it she acted upon some hidden impulse and called him.

"It's Sarah Brownell," she said, and because she became suddenly amazed at what she had done, she felt impelled to give some reason for her action.

"Your friends in Bakerton wanted to be remembered to you, John. I—I have left there for good, too."

She heard John saying politely that he would like to see her, to get news of the hometown folks. How about Thursday evening? Would that be convenient for her?

Perhaps the telephone call brought Sarah good luck. At any rate, the following day she landed a job. Not a very lucrative one, but one with the excellent firm of Feltz & Willard, with opportunity for promotion later on.

It gave her a feeling of assurance. Thursday evening when John came to be able to tell him that she was employed.

Two years had greatly changed John. His eyes carried a tired look that she had not remembered. His shoulders drooped. Yet he told her he was doing very well. A good position, a good salary.

"It's a wonderful thing," cried Sarah with shining eyes, "to have shaken the dust of Bakerton from our feet!" John looked at her quickly. "You feel that way?" he asked.

"I certainly do!" said Sarah firmly. She made him cocoa on the tiny gas plate and cinnamon toast. He said he would like to come again.

The winter passed quickly. With the advent of spring Sarah began to feel very tired. The confinement indoors and the lack of exercise had taken all her fine color. John, too, looked worn but Sarah long ago had found out why John, for all his position and his salary, was continually worried.

There was a girl. Had been a girl for some time. Little by little Sarah found out about her. John had thought he loved her in the beginning, taken in by her smart, sophisticated city ways.

They had become engaged and presently John had found out that he didn't care for her at all. But the girl—Tessie, her name was—still clung. She was fond of John's spending power.

John asked Sarah's advice and, in the course of conversation, blurted out something which took her completely aback. "I made a mistake when I left the farm. Some can stand the noise and hustle and indoors of city life. But I was meant for the country. I get so I stand at my window and imagine where the hills lie and I wish I could go to the other side.

Sarah was very still for a moment. Then she clasped her hands like a child. "There's your answer, John. Tell Tessie you have decided to go back to farming. Take it for granted she will go, too. Then see what happens!"
