ZWIEBACK AND Granose Biscuit... Fresh at H. C. JOHNSON'S

Correct Barring. C. A. Damon of Chicago has furnished the American Poultry Journal the specimen Barred Plymouth Rock feathers which are here illustrated. The feathers are from the first prize pullet at Milwaukee, 1890. This bird was second, 93%, by Sharpe Butterfield. Level Roost the Best. When the roosts are level, the fowls will have plenty of room, but if the roosts are slanting from the wall the hens will seek the highest ones, as instinct prompts them to get as far from danger as possible. In the wild state the greatest number of enemies of fowls is below them at night. They therefore seek elevated roosting places as the safest. The domestic fowls do the same. They will struggle to get on the top roost, and if there are 100 hens together they will endeavor to crowd until they are pushed off, falling and struggling until darkness compels them to become quiet. If one has a large poultry house and the roosts are slanting, there will be a waste of space, and crowding will not be avoided; but place the roosts so that all will be on the same height, and more room will be afforded, the fowls will not crowd, and they will be more comfortable. Sometimes only a small matter may be the way of egg production, and it has happened that the slanted roosts have caused the hens to nearly suffocate on a warm night, rendering them unable to give a profit.—Poultry Keeper. No matter what you want in the way of fine job printing, The Citizen can do it.
