Harold Jacoby in N. Y. Evening Post, On May 28 of the present year we shall have an opportunity to see an uncommon astronomical occurrence. The sun will be totally eclipsed, and the event will be visible in parts of the United States.

Occasionally, as we know, the moon passes between us and the sun, cutting off the latter's light completely. This we call a solar eclipse. Lunar eclipses, on the other hand, are caused by the moon's reaching such a position that the earth is directly between it and the sun. The moon has no inherent brilliancy like the sun; it shines only by reflecting solar light; and when that light is cut off, the moon simply "goes out." But the sun is self-luminous, and is in reality thining just the same when under eclipse as at any other time. Thus we arrive at this fundamental difference between lunar and solar eclipses. In the former, the moon having suddenly ceased to receive or reflect light, the eclipse is observable wherever the moon, if uneclipsed, would be visible. But at any given moment we can usually see the moon from one-half of the earth's surface. Consequently if a lunar eclipse takes place, a majority of the earth's inhabitants have an opportunity to observe it, and thus a lunar eclipse is semething that almost any person can remember to have seen. But it is very different with the sun. As we have said, he continues to give light when eclipsed; so that it is only in places where the sun is actually covered by the moon that he will seem to be eclipsed. The moon under eclipse is like a candle that has been extinguished; it is dark from whatever side we look at it. But the eclipsed sun is like the burning candle, which will be invisible to him only whose view is obstructed by the interposition of some opaque object.

That opaque object is the moon. But she is comparatively small and cannot render the sun totally invisible from more than a tiny circular or oval spot on the earth's surface. In the eclipse of May 28 that little spot will be only about 75 miles wide; and if the moon were not in motion, the total phase of the eclipse could be seen nowhere else. But the moon is traveling all the time through space in its orbit around the earth. So the little spot is moving, too, and changing its position gradually upon the earth's surface. Thus, instead of a spot we shall have a long strip or band about 75 miles wide; and by waiting for the right moment, it will be possible to see totality from any point within this band. The whole thing is much as though there were a huge pencil, with its point touching the earth, and having its other end pivoted to the sun. If the moving moon were then also attached to this pencil somewhere near the point, she would draw the pencil along and the point would trace out the eclipse path on our earth. Anyone standing in that path could then look along the pencil. and the proper moment see the moon covering the sun, and obscuring his light. In places situated near this path of totality, as it is called, we shall be able to see the eclipse, but not as a total one. For such places the moon will cover the sun only in part, so that some of his brilliant surface will remain in sight. The amount of obscuration always depends upon the observer's nearness to the totality line. The nearer he is, the more nearly total the eclipse will be. gins in the Pacific ocean just west of Mexico. There the point of the huge pencil we have imagined first touches our earth. It then passes eastward ar oss Mexico, and entering the United States near New Orleans, proceeds in a northeasterly direction until it haves the continent close to Norfolk, Then it crosses the Atlantic, tuches Portugal, and afterwards In ses across northern Africa, leaving t) - earth finally near the vorthern end of the Red Sea. In this country the ci les of New Orleans, La., Mobile, Ala., Raleigh, N. C., and Norfolk, Va., a o all on the totality path. At New O cans the sun will be completely cover 1 at 7:30 a.m., while at Norfolk this will not happen until 8:53 a, m. In the for mer city totality will last 78 seconds and in the latter 102 seconds. At interme liate places both the time and the duration of totality will fall between these extreme values. For places nearer to New Orleans than Norfolk the numbers will be nearer these given for N w Orleans, and vice versa.

On May 28 the path of totality be-
