The Ford Engine

The engine of the new Model A Ford car represents one of the most remarkable engineering accomplishments in the history of automotive development. While not radically new in principle or design, it represents a new combination of engineering principles which has produced the best tested performance features of the older types of automobile engines with the most important features of the newer types.

Without abandoning entirely the principles of the old low-compression, low-speed motors in favor of the extremely high-speed, high-compression type, Ford engineers have developed a medium speed, medium-compression motor that has proved itself much better adapted to the needs of a light car. A wide variety of uses under all sorts of road conditions and in widely varying climates are thus served more satisfactorily than would be possible with a radically high-speed, high-compression motor.

Its power, smoothness and flexibility are remarkable for its size and weight. The Model A motor develops 40 brake horsepower at 2200 revolutions per minute. In accounting for this performance credit must be given to the following improvements: An induction system which permits a better and more uniform flow of air and fuel to the combustion chamber; redesigned valve and combustion chambers which give higher, more uniform power impulses; lighter but stronger reciprocating parts and increased bearing sizes which result in sturdier construction and consequently smoother operation; newly designed hot-spot manifold gives unusually efficient carburetion and there is also improved timing.

The combination of these features has produced a motor that gives unusual speed and power for its size and weight and at the same time one that is long-wearing, economical in fuel consumption and simple to operate and maintain. Because of its comparatively low speed it does not work the self-destruction that comes as a natural result of wear when moving parts are operated at the higher rate of speed, and yet it has considerably more power, smoothness and flexibility than the low-speed motors.

Mann states that he will release these birds on farms whose owners will agree to protect the quail. The game warden will fill applications in order of receipt in so far as the number of birds will permit.

Thrilling Railroad Picture

Said to be one of the most thrilling railroad pictures ever screened, "The Night Flyer," a James Cruze production starring William Boyd and featuring Jobyna Ralston as leading woman, will be on view at the Macon Theatre on Wednesday and Thursday of next week. The story deals with a railroad fireman who risks his life to secure a mail contract for his company and whose train is wrecked. This scene has been graphically pictured. The love element is strong. Philo McCullough, Ann Schaeffer and De Witt Jennings are in the supporting cast.
