Miss Susan Iden of the Raleigh Times was here last week getting data for a feature story for her paper. She expressed herself as delighted with this part of the state.

Infantile Paralysis

There has recently occurred several cases of infantile paralysis in different sections of North Carolina. Naturally the people in the sections affected have become concerned more than usual about the situation. It may be that there are more cases than are usually reported from this disease, but it may be said that every summer there occur some cases about over the State. In some sections of the country for the past two or three years outbreaks of the disease have been more severe than usual. There is probably more concern about the situation in this State at present than has been since 1925.

It is well that the people of North Carolina should become informed about this disease. Strictly speaking, it should not be called infantile paralysis, because it is not confined entirely to infants, and another reason is that it occurs often without any indications of paralysis. The technical name of the disease is poliomyelitis, but as this is a very long and hard name to pronounce, infantile paralysis, being understood, still serves better. Very little is known about the disease, particularly as to the infectious agent causing it and the methods by which it is spread. The one thing that we do understand about the disease is that it seems to be confined for the most part to the hot summer months, disappearing in the early fall, after the first few weeks of cold weather.

The intelligent and watchful parent may best guard against the serious after-effects of this disease by exercising the usual precaution in taking immediate action whenever a child in the family becomes ill. When a baby or young child gets sick and the temperature goes up and the parents cannot satisfy themselves as to the cause or nature of the trouble, and if the child remains sick more than a very few hours, the only advisable course is to send for the family physician and let him make a careful examination and the proper measures for safeguarding the health of the other members of the family, as well as caring for the sick child.

The onset of this disease may be sudden or it may be insidious. The child may get sick, be apparently bad off, and in a few hours apparently get better. The doctors call this a remission of symptoms. There may be an interval of several days following this first stage, when the child will get very sick again, and the next time there can be no mistake. For the foregoing reasons it is advisable for parents to consult the family doctor right in the beginning of any illness of children which cannot be accounted for satisfactorily. There is fever and digestive disturbances, such as vomiting with diarrhoea, sometimes constipation, sometimes sore throat, or symptoms resembling influenza are present. The child is generally listless and tired. With a child old enough, he may complain of headache. If the thing goes on long, there is restlessness and irritability and so on. Other diseases have these same symptoms, and it is for the doctor to decide.

The purpose of this article is to advise the parent to take no chances with a sick child, but let the doctor decide whether or not it is a contagious disease, and if the child shall apparently have infantile paralysis, it should be isolated from other children, and careful technical treatment instituted which will prevent as far as possible the terrible paralysis, with subsequent deformities, if not actual death, which so often takes place. There should be no manipulation of the limbs whatever except the kind of manipulation advised by orthopedic experts and carried out by trained nurses.

The time for effective treatment is right in the beginning of the attack, and the best method of prevention is the same which applies to so many other contagious diseases, and that is keeping the very young children away from crowds or gatherings of any kind, especially when infectious diseases are known to be present in the community.
