NEED PARK SITE AT INDIAN MOUND

Historic Cherokee Remains Should Be Preserved, Says Morgan

W. J. Morgan, who, for more than 40 years, has been studying the history of the Cherokee nation and the relics left by the Cherokees, was in Franklin last week on a business trip. Mr. Morgan formerly lived in this county, but is now a resident of Brevard.

While here last week, Mr. Morgan made some pointed remarks on the need of preserving sites of historic interest left by the Cherokees. The Indian mounds are among these sites, and one of these is situated inside the incorporate limits of Franklin.

"The Indian mound at Franklin," Mr. Morgan stated, "is one of the better known of the Cherokee remains. It is at least 600 years old, possibly 1200 or 1500 years old. It was commenced in a small way, and to this small beginning the Cherokee added from time to time. It was probably a long while in the course of construction. The Cherokee could become highly enthusiastic, but his ardor did not last over a long period. For this reason it is not probable that the mound was constructed without interruption."

State Forester J. S. Holmes has put forward the plan of having the state take over such historical sites as the Indian mound for the purpose of creating small parks, even though some parks might be only an acre or half an acre in extent.

As pointed out by Mr. Morgan, a person could come to Macon, purchase the mound, and have it leveled to the ground in search of Indian relics before steps could be taken to stop him.
