SOUTHERN NEED FOR RESEARCH STATION MET

The laboratory will be in connection with the Highlands Museum which was established in 1927 and will have direct bearing on it as the discoveries and developments of the laboratory will directly effect the number and type of exhibits in the museum.

Dr. Reinke came to Highlands in 1929 to act as director of the museum for that year. While here he made a study of the facilities of Highlands and prepared a report on the advisability of establishing here a biological research laboratory.

The Vanderbilt biologist says that Highlands, with its central position, its altitude, its varied physiographic features and its wealth of living material affords an ideal location for the Highlands Museum and Biological Laboratory.

L. Stejneger, head curator of the department of biology of the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D. C., asserts that no region in the United States is more interesting, more important, and less known zoologically.

A glance at a map shows that Highlands is almost the exact center of a circular area including all the southeastern states but Florida. This fact alone was a major factor in the selection of a site for the laboratory.
