

FARM AND HOME DEPARTMENT

Planting By the Moon

Sowing, reaping, breeding, butchering, shearing, and other farm activities are regulated by many according to the "light" or "dark" of the moon.

Farming according to the moon has no support from any scientific point of view, as the moon has no influence on animals, the weather or the soil.

Like many other fallacies which have gained wide currency among various peoples, these fanciful ideas are giving way before the investigations of science.

FASHIONS, FADS, FOIBLES

Hemlines are coming down. They now are twelve to thirteen inches from the floor for daytime, shorter for sports; eight inches for late afternoon, with a few reaching the ankle; instep or floor length for evening.

Daytime silhouettes are straight with slight flares. Boleros, or short jackets; peplums; deep flounces and ruffles are frequent. Sleeves are doing strange things. They may be plain, have capes from the shoulder, be puffed above the elbow or bell shaped below it.

Belts are at the normal waist line. Fabrics most used are plain woolsens, light weight knit fabrics, monotone tweeds, Scotch plaids, heavy silk velvets, laces, satin, broadcloth. Colors are green, with a yellowy green for evening; warm browns and maroons and black, with an off-black, a dark prune, called "ink."

Hats are worn astonishingly far back on the head; or diagonally, up on one side, down on the other. The double brim is new, cut and folded in clever ways, either up or down. The beret-hat, like a skull cap, covers about that much of the head.

EAT LITTLE MUTTON IN NORTH CAROLINA

Few North Carolina citizens have the chance to eat home-grown lamb and mutton.

"We have less than one sheep for each three persons in the State," says Earl Hostetler, animal husbandman for the Experiment Station at State college. "In 1929 we had only 116,418 head of sheep listed. Quite a few of these were breeding animals.

Mr. Hostetler finds that 50 per cent of the entire sheep population is in five western counties. While these five counties are well adapted to the industry, there are also excellent opportunities for growing sheep in other parts of the State.

As a usual thing, few lambs reach the market in May and June and therefore the price is good during these two months. Lambs dropped in January and February, if properly fed and looked after, will be ready for the market on June 1.

He concludes that sheep are more profitable than any other class of animals when the initial cost is considered. They are more susceptible to disease and cannot take care of themselves under adverse conditions. Given the right conditions and proper care, however, they will pay a good profit and should be found on every farm.
