FARM BUILDING NEED IS CITED BY WEAVER

The crying need for better farm buildings has been brought into sharp relief by North Carolina's changing agriculture, says Prof. David S. Weaver, head of the Agricultural Engineering Department, State College.

Poultry houses of various kinds, including laying houses, brooder houses, and summer ranges are in demand at this time, Prof. Weaver says, and the ever-increasing livestock and the production of feed for their consumption create some of the problems of adequate farm buildings.

"If sufficient and satisfactory building space is not available for handling this year's crop, it is not too early to give consideration to that problem," he says, pointing out that a great many farmers like to cut their own timber and have it seasoned so that when they are prepared to build, it will not be necessary for them to purchase lumber.

Two types of buildings for which there is an increasing demand at present are grain houses and sweet potato storage houses. Each of these requires careful consideration as to location, design and construction, Weaver says. The department of Agriculture Engineering has for free distribution to farmers desiring to build, either of these types of structures, as well as many other plans. Prof. Weaver suggests that farmers decide what plan is needed, then consult their county agents, who have complete lists of these plans.
