CARE FOR EWES NOW, VETERINARIAN SAYS

Pointing out that pregnancy disease in American sheep flocks is fatal in nine out of ten cases, Dr. C. D. Grinnells, veterinarian for the N. C. Experiment Station, suggests that North Carolina sheep men give extra attention to the care and feeding of ewes in the next few weeks.

The following timely recommendations are offered by Dr. Grinnells to help farmers deal with the problem:

Be sure that ewes receive proper rations—including a liberal allowance of clean, bright legume hay. In addition, good, sound grain should be added to the diet during the last six or eight weeks of pregnancy, but overfeeding should be avoided.

Provide adequate salt, and arrange for regular feeding hours. Avoid abrupt changes in the kind or amount of feed.

Require the ewes to take moderate exercise; one good way is to feed them at least a quarter mile away from the bedding ground or shed.

As lambing time nears, watch the flock closely for signs of pregnancy disease. Symptoms include grinding of the teeth, dullness, weakness, and finally complete collapse.

If a suspected case occurs, obtain a veterinary diagnosis at once. In the early stages of this disease, recovery can often be aided by medical treatment. In recent research on treatment of pregnancy disease, veterinary scientists have found that niacin and thiamin also appear to be valuable, Dr. Grinnells said.

There is comparatively little interest in beekeeping in North Carolina counties where cash crops yield little or no nectar.

Mrs. C. A. Aydtette of Grandy, Currituck County, is planning to install a picking machine to dress her own chickens and to do custom dressing for her neighbors.
