

STATE COLLEGE HINTS TO FARM HOMEMAKER

By VERNA STANTON
Assistant State Agent

A big question in the minds of many farm families these days is whether or not to remodel the old farmhouse. Before getting deep into plans for making an old house more comfortable, efficient and attractive, first make sure that the house was well built and is still sound, housing experts of the U. S. Department of Agriculture advise.

Thorough remodeling generally takes less material but more labor than building a new structure, say these specialists. If an old house needs complete rebuilding, this usually costs more than putting up a new house.

Before deciding to remodel, they advise: (1) Examine the house from foundation to roof and estimate the needed repairs and their cost. (2) Look at the location, thinking of good drainage, protection from cold winds which make a house hard to heat, protection from flooding during heavy rains, good sewage disposal, convenience to the highway. (3) The water supply is important. Water should be plentiful and tested for safety.

If the house and its site stand inspection, and remodeling seems like a wise investment, give as much thought to remodeling plans as you would to planning a new house, say the experts. They suggest checking the following points carefully.

Have you planned for enough rooms for your family's needs? Traffic lanes—house entrances convenient to the drive; kitchen and work areas arranged to save steps; dining space convenient to kitchen serving area; living space; sleeping space; utilities; appearance; and cost.
