Keep Chickens On Full Feed
 During this hot weather, an all-out effort should be made to keep chickens on full feed.
 Why? Dr. R. S. Dearstyne of the State College poultry science department says that a chicken to live, grow, and perform properly, must have a constant intake of feed.
 What can the poultryman do about the lag in appetite of his chickens during extremely warm weather? Fresh mash is one important thing. Chickens eat more freely of fresh mash than that which accumulates in the hoppers over a period of several days.
 Feed goes stale very rapidly in hot weather. Under such conditions, replenishing the feed daily should stimulate the appetites of the birds and aid in a greater and more uniform consumption of mash, Dearstyne says. This aids growth and should give a greater distribution of egg production. Only enough feed for the day's consumption, plus a little extra for early morning feeding, should be placed in the hoppers. The stirring of the mash in the hoppers several times a day is also a good practice.
 Dearstyne reminds poultrymen not to forget ventilation during hot weather. Open all windows, doors, and other ventilating facilities but watch for sudden weather changes. Be sure that an ample supply of water is available. It's a good idea to even double the watering space during the hottest period.
