To the oldest the woodpile had a cheerful appearance and the fire in an open place was cheerful. But the old time woodpile like many other old things has had its day.

Some wood may have been cut the winter before in order to have plenty of dry wood on hand. There would be plenty of green hardwood such as hickory, ash and oak cut for the fire place wood. This would be cut in wagon lengths and hauled to the woodpile. Early in the beginning of the cool season there would be a large pile of wood unloaded at the woodpile. There would be an abundance of soft wood cut for cooking purposes. There could be plenty of green hardwood cut into fire place lengths. To go with the back logs would be fore logs. There was always an abundance of kindling and wood to fill in between. Once the fire began burning more green and dry hardwood would be put on. No matter if the ground was covered with snow and the wintry winds were howling there was plenty of warmth and cheer in the room. No castle or mansion was ever more cheerful and pleasant than such a room.

There were no televisions or radio to distract attention. There were no bombs and no artificial satellite to fill people with fear.

At bed time the fire was covered with ashes. In the morning there was a bed of live coals and soon another fire would be going. With the odor of country sausage, ham and steaming coffee the early mornings were just as happy and pleasant as the evenings. Modern inventions have taken away the old time woodpile forever. They may have made life easier without increasing the happiness of the days of the old time woodpile.
