Hot Springs regrets the loss of her post as head of the Madison County Library, but understands that the larger quarters offered by the county seat is a beneficial step forward in our county's progress. With good grace, Hot Springs will accept her role as a branch library, run by volunteer workers and donate funds. Knowing the tremendous educational value of a public library, the citizens of Hot Springs are busy forming plans for their library branch. Hot Springs knows that a better town will spring from our future educated young people. Everyone is aware that only the public library can keep on hand the information and literature so vital to their education. The future will demand more highly skilled and educated, active citizens and Hot Springs will be prepared to supply them. Marshall, being the county seat, does well deserve the position of centering the library within its city limits, but Hot Springs will continue its library work, as a branch, so that materials will always be available to its citizens.
