News for Veterans
Some 250,000 veterans are expected to be in training this fall under the Korean GI Bill, a 40 per cent drop under last fall's 400,000, the Veterans Administration predicted.

At the same time, enrollments of disabled Korea veterans under VA's vocational rehabilitation training program probably will drop to 7,500 this fall from last fall's figure of 10,000.

However, a smaller, newer program administered by VA, War Orphans Education, is expected to increase its enrollments from last fall's 9,000 to around 12,000 this fall. This program is for the sons and daughters of veterans who died of service-connected conditions.

Well over half of the 250,000 Korean GI Bill trainees will be in the nation's colleges and universities, the VA said. The rest will be in schools below the college level, and in on-the-job and on-the-farm training.

The Veterans Administration expects GI enrollments to continue to decline until 1965, when the GI Bill program comes to an end. Vocational training for disabled Korea veterans also is expected to drop. But the War Orphans Education program most likely will continue to go up for several years; this program has no terminal deadline.
