The penalty in Biblical days for God's laws, and that often brought adultery was death. Jesus taught that human life was God-given, and therefore could not be deoften sought to entrap him with stroyed by man. If he subscribed to the ultimate penalty of the law, he was therefore forsaking His own teachings; if, on the other hand, he commuted the sentence, He was breaking the law. From the point of view of his enemies, He therefore convicted himself whichever way He turned.

Jesus, not unaware of what they sought to do to Him, avoided such pitfalls. With an air of almost complete detachment He spoke: "Let those among you who Glenna West had charge of the are without sin, cast the first stone". BROAD REPORT

EDITOR'S NOTE: This column will report on the economy in Buncome, Haywood, Henderson, Madison, and Transylvania Counties. From time to time it will discuss research findings compiled in the two volume study, "Economic Development of the Upper French Broad Area), published in May, 1964 by the Department of Agricultural Economics of North Caro-State University. L. D. Hyde is Executive Director of the Upper French Broad Economic Development Commission.

The Upper French Broad Economic Development Commission and the Western North Carolina Regional Planning Commission are working with the North Carolina Department of Water Resources and the Tennessee Valley Authority to jointly embark on a program of economic and resource development for the Upper French Broad Area. North Carolina State University is cooperating on the economic research required in the formation of a development program. Futher investigations are underway related to specific sectors of the area's economy.

The research efforts aim to contribute to the development of the Upper French Broad economy in three ways. The two volume study first contains an inventory of the resources and activities of the area at the present time. Second, it contains analyses that attempt to give understanding of changes in the resources and growth of the economy since 1940. Third, there is appraisal with suggestions for actions for develop-

The survey report points out has had considerable economic de velopment. With the exception of agriculture, employment has grown nearly as fast as in the U. S. during the last ten years. Future development will come from enchancing these human and natural assets and from employing them more effectively.

Particularly favorable to future growth are the momentum of recent manufacturing expansion still carrying forward and potential for participating in the rapid advance of the recreation industry.
