

EXTENSION NEWS

A new Extension publication, "Mountain Trout," is now available through the county Agricultural Extension office in Marshall. This publication gives general information on how to catch trout, how to handle fresh trout, how to freeze trout and some other valuable information on trout. It contains a number of recipes on the preparation of trout. Any Madison County person interested in a copy of this publication may have one free by contacting the county Agricultural Extension office

Slugs and snails are a threat to young tobacco plants, both in the bed and field. They are worse in wet weather for two reasons. One is that they are unable to live in the sunlight. Two, the old type baits are not as effective in wet weather.

There are two types of poison baits on the market. Farmers are still using the old type of bait containing methaldehyde and arsenic. The new bait is a combination of methaldehyde and Sevin. Both seem to be doing a fairly good job of killing the pests. The treatment must be continued if the later hatching slugs are to be controlled.

Place the bait around the bed or in the field in the late afternoon for best results. Its effect may soon be lost due to exposure to sunlight and rain. In this event, repeat the treatment.

Many problems can be avoided in the production of vine-ripe tomatoes. A source of infection for tomato late blight is present in most of the potatoes produced from home grown seed. A regular spray program followed every five days will prevent the spread of early blight and late blight on tomatoes. Nearby Irish potatoes should be sprayed on the same schedule to prevent the spread of tomato late blight from Irish potatoes in the garden or commercial fields.

Flea beetles are particularly bad with the present weather conditions. Tomatoes should be sprayed with DDT as 50% Wt. This can be included in the same spray material for blight control. In dealing with tomato disease and insect control nothing can be truer than the old statement, "A stitch in time saves nine."

Beer belongs but is it bought in or brought in Madison County?

Will you lose out when vacation time comes?

About 34,000,000 tourists will visit North Carolina this year. Because it's part of the American way of life, most of them feel that "beer belongs." Chances are most of them will bring beer in—if they can't buy it in—your city or county.

And when vacation time comes, do your own citizens flock over the county line toward areas where beer is available legally?

Last year, the 74 counties* and municipalities which permit legal sale of beer received $5,127,383.83 in State beer excise taxes. Does it make sense that your county or municipality be deprived of its share of this revenue? Think it over the next time legal sale is mentioned.

To find out more about how your county or city can benefit by legal control, write for a free booklet, The Beer Industry in North Carolina.
