House plant responds to proper light
WASHINGTON (UPI)—Many kinds of decorative plants, the U.S. Department of Agriculture points out, can now be grown under fluorescent lights at home in an indoor garden. Indoor gardens come in many shapes and sizes, each with its own decorative purpose. Some may brighten up an otherwise dull, dimly lit, corridor, while others may provide a room or light a wall.

The primary requirements for an indoor garden are a planter box, a good lighting system, properly selected plants, and care. The planter box can be made of pine, fir, or veneered plywood, which can be painted, stained, or oiled to suit your tastes.

FASHIONETTES
Ole Borden, designing for Rembrandt clothes, believes in the nearly-nude look for spring, but "only when it's done with good taste."

Strapless bodices, bare backs and deeply plunged or halter necklines are marks of his evening clothes. "In an age of sexual liberation," Borden says, "women want to show their bodies. If any status symbol exists, it is the body beautiful. There is more emphasis on the body than on clothes."

Approaching the spring fashion season softly yet dramatically, designer Teal Traina salutes beauty. Symbolic of this spirit in his many-faceted collection is a long silk chiffon dress called Pagoda. Combining drifts of color, a delicate swoop of sleeve and a shapely bodice, it floats downward into fold on fold of black circling skirt.
